PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

THE present volume has grown out of certain chapters relating to the Poetics in the first edition of 'Some Aspects of the Greek Genius.' These chapters have been enlarged, and partly re-written ; and further questions, not touched on in the earlier volume, and bearing on Aristotle's theory of tragedy, are here discussed. A text and a translation of the Poetics are prefixed to the Essays.

It is just a hundred years since a critical text of the Poetics has been published in Great Britain. Tyrwhitt's edition, which appeared at Oxford in 1794, was, indeed, the work of an admirable scholar ; but since that time much light has been thrown on almost every page of this treatise. And yet even to-day, after all the labours of German scholars, no editor can hope to produce a text • which will not provoke dissent on the part of competent critics. For my own part, I find myself more frequently in agreement with William Christ on questions of reading, than with any previous editor. Susemihl, to whom every student of Aristotle is profoundly indebted, appears to me to carry conjecture too far, more especially in the transposition of sentences and the omission of words. On the other hand, Vahlen's adherence to the Parisian MS. (A<sup>c</sup>) borders on superstition,—if one may dare so to speak of the critic who in a pre-eminent degree has contributed to the elucidation of the Poetics.

The superiority of the Parisian over all other extant MSS. is beyond dispute; still I cannot share the confidence with which the best editors now speak of it as the sole source from which the rest are derived. It is true there are no decisive passages by which the independent value of these latter can be established. But that some of them have an independent worth is rendered highly probable by two considerations. First, by the appearance in them of words which are omitted in A<sup>c</sup>, but are necessary to complete the sense. The missing words are not unfrequently such as a copyist could hardly have supplied. Secondly, by the number of instances in which the true reading is hopelessly obscured in A<sup>c</sup>, but preserved in some of the so-called 'apographa.' No ordinary scribe could have hit on such happy corrections. While doubting, however, whether A<sup>c</sup> is indeed the archetype of all extant MSS., I have, for the sake of convenience, retained in the critical notes the usual

The conjectures of my own which are admitted into the text are few in number. They will be found in iii. 3. 1448 a 33, xix. 3. 1456 b 8, xxiii. 1. 1459 a 17, xxiv. 10. 1460 a 35, xxv. 4. 1460 b 17, xxv. 14. 1461 a 27, xxv. 16. 1461 a 35.<sup>1</sup> The emendation in xxiii. 1, ἐνὶ μέτρῳ μιμητικῆς for ἐν μέτρῳ μιμητικῆς will, I hope, appear as plausible to others as it is convincing to myself. In ix. 5 (οὕτω πὰ τυχόντα ὀνόματα), though I have not altered the traditional reading, yet for reasons stated in note 1, p. 375, I suspect we ought to read οὐ τὰ τυχόντα ὀνόματα, and I venture to press this suggestion. In a certain number of passages I have bracketed words, hitherto retained by the editors, which I take to be glosses that have crept into the text. The passages are these—iii. 1. 1448 a 23, vi. 18. 1450 b 13, xvii. 1. 1455 a 27, xvii. 5. 1455 b 22.<sup>2</sup> But the detailed treatment of these and other questions of criticism and interpretation must be reserved for the more fitting pages of a commentary.

<sup>2</sup> In vi. 18 I read in ed. 2 τῶν λεγομένων (Gomperz) instead of [τῶν μὲν λόγων] of ed. 1, and in xvii. 5 ὅτι αὐτός (Bywater) for [τινὰς αὐτός]. In ed. 3, however, I return to the MSS. reading in xvii. 5: see infra, p. xxv.

Poetry and Art are not affected by the minor difficulties with which the Poetics abounds. Incomplete as our material is when all scattered references have been brought together, the cardinal points of Aristotle's aesthetic theory can be seized with some certainty. But his Poetics must be read in the light of his other writings; we must trace the links which connect his theory of Art with his philosophic system as a whole; we must discover the meaning he attaches to 'Imitation' as an aesthetic term,—a somewhat infelicitous term, it must be owned, inherited by him from his predecessors, but henceforth charged with a new meaning. Such an inquiry will dispel the vulgar notion that still survives in popular manuals, that by 'Imitation' Aristotle means a literal copy, a mere facsimile of the world of experience. The clue to his real thought is to be found in the assertion that Poetry is an expression of the 'universal'; that is, of the universal element in human life. In interpreting the full significance of this conception frequent reference will of necessity be made to the wider principles of the Aristotelian philosophy.

In the following pages I have attempted to bring out some of the vital connexions which are thus suggested between Aristotle's theory of Poetry and other sides of his comprehensive thought. In endeavouring to state his views and estimate their worth candidly and without exaggeration, I have not forgotten that Aristotle, more than any other writer, has suffered from the intemperate admiration of his friends. There have been periods when he was held to be infallible both in literature and in philosophy. A sovereign authority has been claimed for him by those who possessed no first-hand knowledge of his writings, and who certainly were not equipped with sufficient Greek to interpret the text. A far truer respect would have been shown him had it been frankly acknowledged, that in his Poetics there are oversights and omissions which cannot be altogether set down to the fragmentary character of the book; that his judgments are based on literary models which, perfect as they are in their kind, do not exhaust the possibilities of literature; that many of his rules are tentative rather than dogmatic; that some of them need revision or qualification; that, for example, the requisites laid down in chap. xiii. for the character of the tragic protagonist would exclude from the first rank of art some of the noblest figures of the Greek drama,—Antigone, Clytemnestra, and possibly Prometheus. On the other hand, we may well wonder at the impartiality of mind, which lifted him above some, at least, of the limitations of his age, though he could not wholly emancipate himself from the external rules and usages of the Athenian theatre.

Above all we may admire his insight into the essential quality of Poetry, as a concrete expression of the universal. To this result he was led by a penetrating analysis of the imaginative creations of Greece itself. Universality is, indeed, their characteristic note. The accidents of human nature seem here to fall into the background, while its larger lineaments are disengaged.

A list of the more important works which treat of the Poetics will be found on page xxxv. I desire, however, here to mention the books which have chiefly aided me in the preparation of the Essays: E. Müller, Geschichte der Kunst bei der Alten, Breslau, 1834. Vahlen, Beiträge zu Aristoteles' Poetik, Wien, 1865. Teichmüller, Aristotelische Forschungen, Halle, 1869. Rein-kens, Aristoteles über Kunst, Wien, 1870. Döring, Die Kunstlehre des Aristoteles, Jena, 1870. Bernays, Zwei Abhandlungen über die Aristotelische Theorie des Drama, Berlin, 1880. I owe, moreover, special and personal thanks to Prof. A. C. Bradley for valuable criticisms on my earlier volume, which I have here turned to account. I have reason also gratefully to acknowledge the singular care and skill displayed by Messrs. R. & R. Clark's Reader.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

THE chief alterations in this edition, as compared with the first, consist in the enlargement of the Critical Notes, and a careful revision of the Translation. Minor changes and additions will be found in the Essays. A third index also has been added containing a list of the passages in Greek authors referred to in the volume.

In making use of the mass of critical material which has appeared in recent years, especially in Germany, I have found it necessary to observe a strict principle of selection, my aim still being to keep the notes within limited compass. They are not intended to form a complete Apparatus Criticus, still less to do duty for a commentary. I trust, however, that no variant or conjectural emendation of much importance has been overlooked.

Of my own conjectures, printed in the text of the first edition, one or two appear to have carried general conviction, in particular that in xxiii. 1.

Two have been withdrawn (see p. vii.). One, which I previously relegated to the notes, while putting in a plea for its acceptance in the preface, has since won the approval of many scholars, including the distinguished names of Professor Susemihl and Professor Tyrrell, and it is with some confidence that I now insert it in the text. I refer to οὐ (οὕτω MSS.) τὰ τυχόντα ὀνόματα in ix. 5. 1451 b 13, where the Arabic has 'names not given at random.' For the copyist's error cf. ix. 2. 1451 a 37 (= a 36 Bekk.), where A<sup>c</sup> has οὕτω, though οὐ τὸ rightly appears in the 'apographa': and for a similar omission of οὐ in A<sup>c</sup> cf. vi. 12. 1450 a 29, οὐ ποιήσει δ' ἦν τῆς τραγῳδίας ἔργον, the indispensable negative being added in 'apographa' and found in the Arabic. The emendation not only gives a natural instead of a strained sense to the words τὰ τυχόντα ὀνόματα, but also fits in better with the general context, as I have argued at some length, pp. 375-8 (note).

Another conjecture of my own I have ventured to admit into the text. In the much disputed passage, vi. 8. 1450 a 12, I read <πάντες> ὥς εἰπεῖν for οὐκ ὀλίγοι αὐτῶν ὥς εἰπεῖν of the MSS., following the guidance of Diels and of the Arabic. I regard οὐκ ὀλίγοι αὐτῶν as a gloss which displaced part of the original phrase (see Critical Notes). As a parallel case I have adduced Rhet. i. 1. 1354 a 12, where οὐδὲν ὥς εἰπεῖν, the reading in the margin of A<sup>c</sup>, ought, I think, to be substituted in the text for the accepted reading ὀλίγον. The word ὀλίγον is a natural gloss on οὐδὲν ὥς εἰπεῖν, but not so οὐδὲν ὥς εἰπεῖν on ὀλίγον.

In two other difficult passages the Rhetoric may again be summoned to our aid. In xvii. 1. 1455 a 27 I have (as in the first edition) bracketed τὸν θεατήν, the object to be supplied with ἐλάνθανεν being, as I take it, the poet, not the audience. This I have now illustrated by another gloss of a precisely similar kind in Rhet. i. 2. 1358 a 8, where λανθάνουσιν τε [τοὺς ἀκροατὰς] has long been recognised as the true reading, the suppressed object being not the audience but the rhetoricians.

Once more, in xxiv. 9. 1460 a 23, where A<sup>c</sup> gives the meaningless ἄλλον δέ, I read (as in the first edition) ἀλλ' οὐδέ, following the reviser of A<sup>c</sup>. This reading, which was accepted long ago by Vettori, has been strangely set aside by the chief modern editors, who either adopt a variant ἄλλο δὲ or resort to conjecture, with the result that προσθεῖναι at the end of the sentence is forced into impossible meanings. A passage in the Rhetoric, i. 2. 1357 a 17 ff., appears to me to determine the question conclusively in favour of ἀλλ' οὐδὲ . . . ἀνάγκη . . . προσθεῖναι. The passage runs thus : ἐὰν γὰρ ᾗ τι τούτων γνώριμον, οὐδὲ δεῖ λέγειν· αὐτὸς γὰρ τοῦτο προστίθῃσιν ὁ ἀκροατής, οἷον ὅτι Δωριεὺς στεφανίτην ἀγῶνα νενίκηκεν, ἱκανὸν εἰπεῖν ὅτι Ὀλύμπια γὰρ νενίκηκεν, τὸ δ' ὅτι στεφανίτης τὰ Ὀλύμπια, οὐδὲ δεῖ προσθεῖναι· γυγνώσκουσι γὰρ πάντες. The general idea is closely parallel to our passage of the Poetics, and the expression of it similar even to the word οὐδέ (where the bare οὐ might have been expected) in the duplicated phrase οὐδὲ δεῖ λέγειν, οὐδὲ δεῖ προσθεῖναι. One difficulty still remains. The subject to εἶναι ἢ γενέσθαι is omitted. To supply it in thought is not, perhaps, impossible, but it is exceedingly harsh, and I have accordingly in this edition accepted Professor Tuck-er's conjecture, ἀνάγκη <κακεῖνο> εἶναι ἢ γενέσθαι. •

The two conjectures of my own above mentioned are based on or corroborated by the Arabic. I ought to add, that in the Text and Critical Notes generally I have made a freer use than before of the Arabic version (concerning which see p. 4). But it must be remembered that only detached passages, literally rendered into Latin in Professor Margoliouth's Analecta Orientalia (D. Nutt 1887), are as yet accessible to those like myself who are not Arabic scholars; and that even if the whole were before us in a literal translation, it could not safely be used by any one unfamiliar with Syriac and Arabic, save with the utmost caution and subject to the advice of experts. Of the precise value of this version* for the criticism of the text, no final estimate can yet be made. But it seems clear that in several passages it carries us back to a Greek original earlier than any of our existing MSS. Two striking instances may here be noted :—

(1) i. 6–7. 1447 a 29 ff., where the Arabic confirms Ueberweg's excision of ἐποποιία and the insertion of ἀνώνυμος before τυγχάνουσα, according to the brilliant conjecture of Bernays (see Margoliouth, Analecta Orientalia, p. 47).

(2) xxi. 1. 1457 a 36, where for μεγαλιωτῶν of the MSS. Diels has, by the aid of the Arabic, restored the word Μασσαλιωτῶν, and added a most ingenious and convincing explanation of Ἑρμοκαϊκόξανθος (see Critical Notes). This emendation is introduced for the first time into the present edition. Professor Margoliouth tells me that Diels' restoration of ἐπενεζόμενος in this passage is confirmed by the fact that the same word is employed in the Arabic of Aristotle's Rhetoric to render εὔχεσθαι.

Another result of great importance has been established. In some fifty instances where the Arabic points to a Greek original diverging from the text of A°, it confirms the reading found in one or other of the 'apographa,' or conjectures made either at the time of the Renaissance or in a more recent period. It would be too long to enumerate the passages here; they will be found noted as they occur. In most of these examples the reading attested by the Arabic commands our undoubting assent. It is, therefore, no longer possible to concede to A<sup>c</sup> the unique authority claimed for it by Vahlen.

I have consulted by the side of Professor Margoliouth's book various criticisms of it, e.g. by Susemihl in Berl. Phil. Wochenschr. 1891, p. 1546, and by Diels in Sitzungsber. der Berl. Akad. 1888, p. 49. But I have also enjoyed the special benefit of private communication with Professor Margoliouth himself upon a number of difficulties not dealt with in his Analecta Orientalia. He has most generously put his learning at my disposal, and furnished me, where it was possible to do so, with a literal translation. In some instances the Arabic is itself obscure, and throws no light on the difficulty; frequently, however, I have been enabled to indicate in the notes whether the existing text is supported by the Arabic or not.

In the following passages I have in this edition adopted emendations which are suggested or confirmed by the Arabic, but which did not find a place in the first edition:—

ii. 3. 1448 a 15, ὥστερ οἱ τοὺς<sup>1</sup>

vi. 7. 1450 a 17, <ὁ δὲ βίος>, omitting καὶ εὐδαιμονίας καὶ ἡ εὐδαιμονία of the MSS.

xi. 6. 1452 b 10, [τούτων δὲ . . . εἰρηρα]

xviii. 6. 1456 a 24, <καὶ> εἰκός<sup>2</sup>

xx. 5. 1456 b 35, <οὐκ> ἀνευ<sup>1</sup>

xxi. 1. 1457 a 34, [καὶ ἀσήμου]. The literal translation of the Arabic is 'and of this some is compounded of significant and insignificant, only not in so far as it is significant in the noun'

xxi. 1. 1457 a 36, Μασσαλιωτῶν (see above, p. xv.)

xxv. 17. 1461 b 12, <καὶ ἴσως ἀδύνατον>

I hesitate to add to this list of corroborated conjectures that of Dacier, now admitted into the text of xxiii. 1. 1459 a 21, καὶ μὴ ὁμοίως ἱστορίας τὰς συνθέσεις, for καὶ μὴ ὁμοίως ἱστορίας τὰς συνήθεις of the MSS. (In defence of the correction see note, p. 165.) The Arabic, as I learn from Professor Margoliouth, is literally 'and in so far as he does not introduce (or, there do not enter) into these compositions stories which resemble.' This version appears to deviate both from our text and from Dacier's conjecture. There is nothing here to correspond to συνήθεις of the MSS.; on the other hand, though συνθέσεις may in some form have appeared in the Greek original, it is not easy to reconstruct the text which the translation implies. Another conjecture, communicated privately to me by Mr. T. M'Vey, well deserves mention. It involves the simpler change of ὁμοίως to οἷας. The sense then is, 'and must not be like the ordinary histories'; the demonstr. τοιούτους being sunk in

I subjoin a few other notes derived from correspondence with Professor Margoliouth:—

(a) Passages where the Arabic confirms the reading of the MSS. as against proposed emendation:—

iv. 14. 1449 ε 27, ἐκβαίνοντες τῆς λεκτικῆς ἁρμονίας: Arabic, 'when we depart from dialectic composition.' (The meaning, however, is obviously misunderstood.)

vi. 18. 1450 b 13, τῶν μὲν λόγων: Arabic, 'of the speech.' The μὲν is not represented, but, owing to the Syriac form of that particle being identical with the Syriac for the preposition 'of,' it was likely to be omitted here by the translator or copyist.

xviii. 1. 1455 b 25. The Arabic agrees with the MSS. as to the position of πολλάκις, 'as for things which are from without and certain things from within sometimes.'

xviii. 5. 1456 a 19, καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἀπλοῖς πράγμασι: Arabic, 'and in the simple matters.'

xix. 2. 1456 a 38, τὰ πάθη παρασκευάζειν: Arabic, 'to prepare the sufferings.'

More doubtful is xvii. 2. 1455 a 30, ἀπὸ τῆς αὐτῆς φύσεως: Arabic, 'in one and the same nature.' The Arabic mode of translation is not decisive as between the MSS. reading and the conjecture ἀπὸ αὐτῆς τῆς φύσεως, but rather favours the former.

(b) Passages where the conjectural omission of words is apparently supported by the Arabic:—

- ix. 9. 1451 b 31, οἷα ἂν εἰκὸς γενέσθαι καὶ δυνατὰ γενέσθαι: Arabic, 'there is nothing to prevent the condition of some things being therein like those which are supposed to be.' But we can hardly say with certainty which of the two phrases the Arabic represents.
- xvi. 4. 1454 b 31, οἷον Ὀρέστης ἐν τῇ Ἰφιγενείᾳ ἀεγνώπων ὅτι Ὀρέστης: Arabic, 'as in that which is called Iphigeneia, and that is whereby Iphigeneia argued that it was Orestes.' This seems to point to the omission of the first Ὀρέστης.<sup>1</sup>

In neither of these passages, however, have I altered the MSS. reading.

• (c) Passages on which the Arabic throws no light:—

- i. 9. 1447 b 22. The only point of interest that emerges is that in the Arabic rendering ('of all the metres we ought to call him poet') there is no trace of καί, which is found alike in A° and the 'apographa.'
- x. 3. 1452 a 20. The words γίγνεσθαι ταῦτα are simply omitted in the Arabic.
- xxv. 18. 1461 b 18, ὥστε καὶ αὐτὸν MSS. The line containing these words is not represented in the Arabic.
- xxv. 19. 1461 b 19, ὅταν μὴ ἀνίγκης οὔσης μηδὲν . . . The words in the Arabic are partly obliterated, partly corrupt.

<sup>1</sup> Vahlen (Hermeneutische Bemerkungen zu Aristoteles' Poetik II. 1898, pp. 3–4) maintains that the inference drawn from the Arabic is doubtful, and he adds strong objections on other grounds to Diels' excision of the first Ὀρέστης.

Apart from the revision of the Text, the Translation has, I hope, been improved in many passages, and the improvements are largely due to the invaluable aid I have received from my friend and colleague, Professor W. R. Hardie. To him I would return my warmest thanks; and also to another friend, Professor Tyrrell, who has read, through the proof-sheets of the earlier portion of the volume, and has greatly assisted me by his literary and critical skill.

The Essays are substantially unchanged, though they have undergone revision in detail and some expansion. In the notes to the Essays some new matter will be found, e.g. pp. 142-4 (on ch. i. 6-9), pp. 375-8 (on ch. ix. 4-5), pp. 259-260 (on ch. xiii. 2).

In conclusion, I desire to acknowledge my obligations to friends, such as Mr. B. Bosanquet (whose History of Aesthetic ought to be in the hands of all students of the subject), Dr. A. W. Verrall, Mr. W. J. Courthope, Mr. A. O. Prickard, and Rev. Dr. Lock, who have written me notes on particular points, and to many reviewers by whose criticism I have profited. In a special sense I am indebted to Professor Susemihl for his review of my first edition in the Berl. Phil. Wochenschr., 28th September 1895, as well as for the instruction derived from his numerous articles on the Poetics, extending over many years in Bursian's Jahresbericht and elsewhere. Among other reviewers to whom I feel grateful, I would mention Mr. Herbert Richards in the Classical Review, May 1895; Mr. R. P. Hardie in Mind, vol. iv. No. 15; and the authors of the unsigned articles in the Saturday Review, 2nd March 1895, and the Oxford Magazine, 12th June 1895.

To Messrs. R. & R. Clark's Reader I would once again express no merely formal thanks.

EDINBURGH, November 1897.

• PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

IN preparing this third edition for the press I have expanded the critical notes and introduced some fresh material here and there into the Essays. The whole has been subjected to minute revision, and nothing of importance, I hope, has escaped me either in the criticisms of reviewers or in recent contributions made to the study of the text or to the general literature of the subject. Certain topics, indeed, might well have invited fuller treatment, but I have been reluctant to allow the volume to grow to an unwieldy size.

In the revision of the text I have had the advantage of consulting two new editions, based on very different principles, those of Professor Bywater and Professor Tucker, from both of which I have derived assistance. In Professor Bywater's edition I have noted the following passages in which manuscript authority (Parisinus 2038) is cited for readings which hitherto have been given as conjectural:—i. 4. 1447 a 21; xi. 5. 1452 b 3 and 4; xv. 1. 1454 a 19; xviii. 1. 1455 b 32; xxii. 7. 1458 b 20 and 29; xxiv. 8. 1460 a 13; xxv. 4. 1460 b 19; xxv. 16. 1461 b 3 and 17. 1461 b 13; xxvi. 3. 1462 a 5; xxvi. 6. 1462 b 6. I am also indebted to Professor Bywater's text for several improvements in punctuation. Most of his important emendations had appeared before the publication of my earlier editions, and had already found a place in the text or in the notes.

I now append the chief passages in which the text of this edition differs from that of the last:—

- vii. 6. 1451 a 9. Here I keep the reading of the MSS., ὥσπερ ποτὲ καὶ ἄλλοτε φασιν. Schmidt's correction εἰώθασιν for φασίν seemed at first sight to be confirmed by the Arabic, but, as Vahlen argues (Hermeneutische Bemerkungen zu Aristoteles' Poetik, 1897), this is doubtful, and—a more fundamental objection—the question arises whether the correction can, after all, convey the sense intended. Can the words as emended refer to a known practice in present time, 'as is the custom on certain other occasions also,' i.e. in certain other contests, the ἀγῶνες of the law-courts being thus suggested? As to this I have always had misgivings. Further observation has convinced me that ποτὲ καὶ ἄλλοτε can only mean 'at some other time also,' in an indefinite past or future. With φασίν (sc. ἀγωνίσασθαι) the reference must be to the past. This lands us in a serious difficulty, for the use of the κλυσύδρα in regulating dramatic representations is otherwise unheard of. Still it is conceivable that a report of some 'such old local custom had reached the ears of Aristotle, and that he introduces it in a parenthesis with the φασίν of mere hearsay.

- ix. 7. 1451 b 21. I accept Welcker's Ἀνθεῖ for ἀνθεῖ. Professor Bywater is, I think, the first editor who has admitted this conjecture into the text.

- xvii. 5. 1455 b 22. I restore the MSS. reading ἀναγνωρίσας τινάς, which has been given up by almost all editors, even the most conservative. Hitherto a parallel was wanting for the required meaning, 'having made certain persons acquainted with him,' 'having caused them to recognise him.' But Vahlen (Herm. Bemerk. 1898) has, if I am not mistaken, established beyond question this rare and idiomatic use of the verb by a reference to Diodorus Siculus iv. 59. 6, and by the corresponding use of γνωρίζω in Plut. Vit. Thes. ch. xii.

- xix. 3. 1456 b 8. For ἡδεῖα of the MSS. I now read ἡ δαίνουα. (Previously I had accepted Tyrwhitt's correction ἡδῆ αἰ δαῖ.) This conjecture was first made by Spengel, and strong arguments in its favour have recently been urged by V. Wróbel in a pamphlet in which this passage is discussed (Leopoli 1900).

- xxv. 6. 1458 b 12. For μέτρον I now read μέτριον with Spengel. (So also Bywater.) Is it possible that in xxvi. 6. 1462 b 7 we should similarly read τῷ τοῦ μετρίου (μέτρου codd.) μήκει, 'a fair standard of length'?

In xiv. 8-9. 1454 a 2-4 a much vexed question is, I am disposed to think, cleared up by a simple alteration proposed by Neidhardt, who in a 2 reads κράτιστον for δεύτερον, and in a 4 δεύτερον for κράτιστον. This change, however, I have not introduced into the text.

The Arabic version once more throws interesting light on a disputed reading. In xvii. 2. ἐκστατικοί instead of ἐξεταστικοί is a conjecture supported by one manuscript. In confirmation of this reading, which has always seemed to me correct, I extract the following note by Professor Margoliouth (Class. Rev. 1901, vol. xv. 54):—‘Professor Butcher . . . informed me that a continental scholar had asserted that the Arabic read ἐκστατικοί for ἐξεταστικοί in this passage. I had been unable to satisfy myself about the Arabic word intended by the writer of the Paris MS., and therefore could not confirm this; but I must regret my want of perspicacity, for I have now no doubt that the word intended is ‘‘ajabiyyīna, which is vulgar Arabic for “buffoons,” literally “men of wonder.” The Syriac translated by this word will almost certainly have been mathh’rūnē, a literal translation of ἐκστατικοί, which the Syriac translator probably thought meant “men who produce ecstasies.” The verb ἐξίστασθαι is not unfrequently rendered by the Syriac verb whence this word is derived.’

In a few other passages the Critical Notes or Translation contain new matter; e.g. ix. 8. 1451 b 23; xvi. 7. 1455 a 14; xxiv. 10. 1460 b 1; xxvi. 6. 1462 b 7.

Turning now from the text to the subject matter of the treatise, I must mention a valuable book, Platon und die Aristotelische Poetik, by G. Finsler (Leipzig 1900). Aristotle's debt to Plato is here set forth in fuller detail than has ever been done before; and though in some instances it may be doubted whether the obligation is not exaggerated and the ideas of these two thinkers brought into rather forced relation, yet there is much to be learned from the volume. In the notes to the Essays I have added many fresh illustrations from Plato, which have been suggested by reading Finsler.

Mr. W. J. Courthope's Oxford Lectures form another noteworthy volume, concerned chiefly with modern poetry, but embodying Aristotelian principles. The estimate of the Poetics in the lecture on 'Aristotle as a Critic' is marked by rare insight and sureness of judgment.

The learned and interesting History of Criticism, by Professor Saintsbury, ought also to be consulted by all students of the Poetics. The first five chapters of vol. i. give an instructive survey of Greek criticism, chapter iii. being devoted to Aristotle. I would direct attention, moreover, to the History of Literary Criticism in the Renaissance (New York 1899), by J. E. Spingarn, to which frequent reference is made in the notes.

I owe to the kindness of Professor Sonnenschein the information as to the significant names in Roman comedy contained in the note pp. 375 ff. In rewriting this whole note, as also that on p. 259, I have slightly modified my former view. Another note, pp. 343-4, gives in a compressed form the result of a conversation with Mr. A. C. Bradley, whom I desire to thank, not for the first time. The remarks added on pp. 225-6 are designed further to elucidate the relation between Art and Morality as I believe it to have been conceived by Aristotle. A few observations on Ibsen's drama will be found on pp. 270-1. It is needless to specify other minor additions of a like kind.

I cannot in concluding omit a word of cordial thanks to Messrs. R. & R. Clark's accomplished Reader.

ARISTOTLE'S THEORY OF POETRY AND THE FINE ARTS

ART AND NATURE

A complete aesthetic theory not to be found in Aristotle . . . . .	113
The theoretic distinction between Fine and Useful Art first established by Aristotle . . . . .	115

CHAPTER II

'IMITATION' AS AN AESTHETIC TERM

'Imitation' as the common characteristic of the Fine Arts: a current phrase interpreted anew by Aristotle . . . . .	121
* The objects of aesthetic imitation are human Character, Emotion, Action ( ἦθος, πάθος, πράξεις ) . . . . .	122
A work of Art is a likeness ( ὁμοιωμα ) of an original, not a symbolical representation ( σημείον ) of it . . . . .	124
A work of Art reproduces its original not as it is in itself, but as it is presented in sensuous form to the 'phantasy' ( φαντασία ) . . . . .	125

This doctrine of aesthetic semblance has important consequences . . .	127
The different senses in which the Arts are 'Imitative': Music . . .	128
Painting and Sculpture . . . . .	132
Dancing. . . . .	136
Poetry, with Music and Dancing as forming a single group . . .	137
Verse as an element of Poetry . . . . .	140
Architecture not included among the Imitative Arts . . . .	148
Imitative or Fine Art in its highest manifestation, namely Poetry, is an expression of the universal element ( τὸ καθόλου ) in human life. In other words, it is an idealised image of human life— of character, emotion, action—under forms manifest to sense . . .	150
Fine Art and Useful Art in different ways complete the purposes of Nature . . . . .	154
Plato, in the Republic , saw in Fine Art a mere semblance, an illusion, as opposed to the reality: Aristotle saw in it the image of a higher reality . . . . .	158

CHAPTER III

POETIC TRUTH

The antithesis between Poetry and History in the Poetics . . .	163
Poetry is not a reproduction of empirical fact: the 'probabilities' and 'possibilities' of Poetry contrasted with those of experience . . .	165
Poetry excludes the rule of Chance . . . . .	180
Ideal unity of Poetry: Aristotle and Bacon here agree . . . .	184
Conception of a poem as an organism . . . . .	186
Poetry is 'a more philosophical and a higher thing than History': it represents the universal through the particular . . . .	191

THE END OF FINE ART

The end of Fine Art is pleasure. Its lower forms afford the pleasure of a pastime ( παιδιά ): its higher forms, that noble enjoyment ( διαγωγή ) which belongs to supreme happiness ( εὐδαιμονία ) . . .	198
The contrast between Plato and Aristotle (1) as to the value of pleasure, (2) as to Art viewed as a pastime . . . . .	203

CONTENTS

The pleasure of the hearer or spectator ( θεαρία ) as the end of Art . . . . .	206
Modern objection to making the end of Art reside in a pleasurable impression . . . . .	207
Value of this objection . . . . .	209

ART AND MORALITY

* The traditional view in Greece asserted the moral office of the Poet . . . . .	215
Even Comedy professed to exercise a moral function . . . . .	218
Aristotle distinguishes the educational from the aesthetic function of Poetry: his critical estimates of Poetry rest on purely aesthetic grounds . . . . .	220
Yet some of his rules indicate a confusion of moral and aesthetic excellence: e.g. tragic characters must be σπουδαῖοι . . . . .	228

THE FUNCTION OF TRAGEDY

Aristotle's definition of Tragedy . . . . .	240
The tragic Katharsis of pity and fear: the medical metaphor . . . . .	243
The musical Katharsis in the Politics . . . . .	248
The Katharsis implies not only an emotional relief but a refining or clarifying of emotion . . . . .	252
How this clarifying process is effected . . . . .	255
The Katharsis theory connected with the general theory of Poetry as a representation of the universal . . . . .	266

CHAPTER VII

THE DRAMATIC UNITIES

Unity of Action is the primary Unity . . . . .	274
Tragedy as an organic whole: 'beginning, middle, and end' . . . . .	275
The law of Unity as applied to the epic and the drama . . . . .	285
The so-called 'Three Unities' . . . . .	288

'Unity of Time': the prevailing practice of the Greek stage, as incidentally noted by Aristotle: afterwards made into a rule of dramatic art . . . . .	289
'A single revolution of the sun': variously interpreted: attempt to make an exact coincidence between the time of the action and the time of the representation . . . . .	293
'Unity of Place' nowhere mentioned in Aristotle; deduced from 'Unity of Time' . . . . .	297
Idealisation of Time and Place . . . . .	299
The higher law of 'Unity of Action' often subordinated to the two minor Unities . . . . .	300

THE IDEAL TRAGIC HERO

The ideal type of protagonist is deduced by Aristotle (ch. xiii.) from the function of Tragedy to produce pity and fear . . . . .	302
The several types of excluded characters: blameless goodness: signal villainy . . . . .	308
Aristotle's ideal protagonist: meaning of ἀναπρία . . . . .	316
Objection examined, that Aristotle's rule leaves no room for a true tragic collision . . . . .	323
Attempts of critics either to explain away Aristotle's words, or to force every play into agreement with his rule . . . . .	325
Aristotle's manner tentative not dogmatic . . . . .	328

PLOT AND CHARACTER IN TRAGEDY

Plot ( μῦθος ) or Action ( πρᾶξις ) is the primary element according to Aristotle: meaning of 'Action' . . . . .	333
Next come ' ἦθος ' and ' διάνοια ': these two factors together constitute Character in its largest sense . . . . .	336
Emphasis with which Aristotle subordinates other elements to 'Action' . . . . .	342
This doctrine has been frequently disputed . . . . .	346

But the intimate relation between Action and Character needs to be more clearly brought out. . . . .	353
Another objection considered. Plot, it is said, overpowered Character in the ancient drama; not so in the modern . . . .	355
Senses in which the modern drama lays increased stress on the delineation of Character . . . . .	356
The artistic principle of the drama discovered by the Greeks . . .	365

CHAPTER X

THE GENERALISING POWER OF COMEDY

Senses of the word 'idealise.' In what sense Tragedy and Comedy respectively idealise life . . . . .	367
The pleasure of the ludicrous as explained by Plato and by Aristotle	372
Aristotle selects Comedy as an example of the universalising faculty of Poetry . . . . .	375
A distinction should be drawn between the generalisation proper to Tragedy and to Comedy . . . . .	382
The line, however, that severs these two kinds of Poetry is less sharply drawn by modern dramatic art: humour and pathos . .	384

POETIC UNIVERSALITY IN GREEK LITERATURE

Aristotle's principles of Art reflect the spirit of Greek Art and Literature . . . . .	388
Oriental Art not included in his survey . . . . .	391
The Greek imagination under the control of reason . . . . .	392
The Sanity of the Greek genius intimately connected with its Universality . . . . .	397
Poetic Universality as shown in the delineation of female character in Greek Poetry . . . . .	398
Poetry and Philosophy in relation to the universal . . . . .	400
Poetry and History: 'Myth' or heroic history is one of the chief means by which the Greek poets ascend from the individual to the universal, by which they idealise the real . . . . .	401

ARISTOTLE'S POETICS

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

- I. 'Imitation' (μίμησις) the common principle of the Arts of Poetry, Music, Dancing, Painting, and Sculpture. These Arts distinguished according to the Medium or material Vehicle, the Objects, and the Manner of Imitation. The Medium of Imitation is Rhythm, Language, and 'Harmony' (or Melody), taken singly or combined.
- II. The Objects of Imitation.
Higher or lower types are represented in all the Imitative Arts. In Poetry this is the basis of the distinction between Tragedy and Comedy.
- III. The Manner of Imitation.
Poetry may be in form either dramatic narrative, pure narrative (including lyric poetry), or pure drama. A digression follows on the name and original home of the Drama.
- IV. The Origin and Development of Poetry.
Psychologically, Poetry may be traced to two causes, the instinct of Imitation, and the instinct of 'Harmony' and Rhythm.
Historically viewed, Poetry diverged early in two directions: traces of this twofold tendency are found in the Homeric poems: Tragedy and Comedy exhibit the distinction in a developed form.
The successive steps in the history of Tragedy are enumerated.
- V. Definition of the Ludicrous (τὸ γελοῖον), and a brief sketch of the rise of Comedy. Points of comparison between Epic Poetry and Tragedy. (The chapter is fragmentary.)

- VI. Definition of Tragedy. Six elements in Tragedy : three external, —namely, Spectacular Presentment (ὁ τῆς δέψεως κόσμος or ὄψις), Lyrical Song (μελωδία), Diction (λέξις); three internal, —namely, Plot (μῦθος), Character (ἥθος), and Thought (διδόξα). Plot, or the representation of the action, is of primary importance; Character and Thought come next in order.
- VII. The Plot must be a Whole, complete in itself, and of adequate magnitude.
- VIII. The Plot must be a Unity. Unity of Plot consists not in Unity of Hero, but in Unity of Action.
The parts must be organically connected.
- IX. (Plot continued.) Dramatic Unity can be attained only by the observance of Poetic as distinct from Historic Truth; for Poetry is an expression of the Universal, History of the Particular. The rule of probable or necessary sequence as applied to the incidents. Certain plots condemned for want of Unity.
The best Tragic effects depend on the combination of the Inevitable and the Unexpected.
- X. (Plot continued.) Definitions of Simple (ἀπλοῖ) and Complex (πεπλεγμένοι) Plots.
- XI. (Plot continued.) Reversal of Intention (περιπέτεια), Recognition (ἀναγνώρισις), and Tragic or disastrous Incident (πάθος) defined and explained.
- XII. The 'quantitative parts' (μέρη κατὰ τὸ ποσόν) of Tragedy defined:—Prologue, Episode, etc. (Probably an interpolation.)
- XIII. (Plot continued.) What constitutes Tragic Action. The change of fortune and the character of the hero as requisite to an ideal Tragedy. The unhappy ending more truly tragic than the 'poetic justice' which is in favour with a popular audience, and belongs rather to Comedy.
- XIV. (Plot continued.) The tragic emotions of pity and fear should spring out of the Plot itself. To produce them by Scenery or Spectacular effect is entirely against the spirit of Tragedy. Examples of Tragic Incidents designed to heighten the emotional effect.
- XV. The element of Character (as the manifestation of moral purpose) in Tragedy. Requisites of ethical portraiture. The rule of necessity or probability applicable to Character as to Plot. The 'Deus ex Machina' (a passage out of place here). How Character is idealised.
- XVI. (Plot continued.) Recognition: its various kinds, with examples.
- XVII. Practical rules for the Tragic Poet:
- (1) To place the scene before his eyes, and to act the parts himself in order to enter into vivid sympathy with the dramatis personae.

(2) To sketch the bare outline of the action before proceeding to fill in the episodes.

XVIII. Further rules for the Tragic Poet :

(1) To be careful about the Complication (δέσις) and Dénouement (λύσις) of the Plot, especially the Dénouement.

(2) To unite, if possible, varied forms of poetic excellence.

(3) Not to overcharge a Tragedy with details appropriate to Epic Poetry.

(4) To make the Choral Odes—like the Dialogue—an organic part of the whole.

XIX. Thought (διδόξα), or the Intellectual element, and Diction in Tragedy.

Thought is revealed in the dramatic speeches composed according to the rules of Rhetoric.

Diction falls largely within the domain of the Art of • Delivery, rather than of Poetry.

XX. Diction, or Language in general. An analysis of the parts of speech, and other grammatical details. (Probably interpolated.)

XXI. Poetic Diction. The words and modes of speech admissible in Poetry : including Metaphor, in particular.

XXIII. Epic Poetry. It agrees with Tragedy in Unity of Action : herein contrasted with History.

XXIV. (Epic Poetry continued.) Further points of agreement with Tragedy. The points of difference are enumerated and illustrated,—namely, (1) the length of the poem ; (2) the metre ; (3) the art of imparting a plausible air to incredible fiction.

XXV. Critical Objections brought against Poetry, and the principles on which they are to be answered. In particular, an elucidation of the meaning of Poetic Truth, and its difference from common reality.

XXVI. A general estimate of the comparative worth of Epic Poetry and Tragedy. The alleged defects of Tragedy are not essential to it. Its positive merits entitle it to the higher rank of the two.

ABBREVIATIONS IN THE CRITICAL NOTES

- A<sup>c</sup> = the Parisian manuscript (1741) of the 11th century: generally, but perhaps too confidently, supposed to be the archetype from which all other extant MSS. directly or indirectly are derived.
- apogr. = one or more of the MSS. other than A<sup>c</sup>.
- Arabs = the Arabic version of the Poetics (Paris 882 A), of the middle of the 10th century, a version independent of our extant MSS. It is not directly taken from the Greek, but is a translation of a Syriac version of the Poetics by an unknown author, now lost. (The quotations in the critical notes are from the literal Latin translation of the Arabic, as given in Margoliouth's Analecta Orientalia.)
- Σ = the Greek manuscript, far older than A<sup>c</sup> and no longer extant, which was used by the Syriac translator. (This symbol already employed by Susemihl I have taken for the sake of brevity.) It must be remembered, therefore, that the readings ascribed to Σ are those which we infer to have existed in the Greek exemplar, from which the Syriac translation was made.
- Ald. = the Aldine edition of Rhetores Graeci, published in 1508.
- Vahlen = Vahlen's text of the Poetics Ed. 3
- Vahlen coni. = * a conjecture of Vahlen, not admitted by him into the text.
- [ ] = words with manuscript authority (including A<sup>c</sup>), which should be deleted from the text.
- < > = a conjectural supplement to the text.
- * * = a lacuna in the text.
- † = words which are corrupt and have not been satisfactorily restored.

ARISTOTLE'S POETICS

1447 a I propose to treat of Poetry in itself and of its various kinds, noting the essential quality of each; to inquire into the structure of the plot as requisite to a good poem; into the number and nature of the parts of which a poem is composed; and similarly into whatever else falls within the same inquiry. Following, then, the order of nature, let us begin with the principles which come first.

Epic poetry and Tragedy, Comedy also and Dithyrambic 2 poetry, and the music of the flute and of the lyre in most of their forms, are all in their general conception modes of imitation. They differ, however, from one 3 another in three respects, — the medium, the objects, the ; manner or mode of imitation, being in each case distinct.

For as there are persons who, by conscious art or 4 mere habit, imitate and represent various objects through the medium of colour and form, or again by the voice; so in the arts above mentioned, taken as a whole, the imitation is produced by rhythm, language, or 'harmony,' either singly or combined.

Thus in the music of the flute and of the lyre, 'harmony' and rhythm alone are employed; also in other arts, such as that of the shepherd's pipe, which are essentially similar to these. In dancing, rhythm alone is used without 'harmony'; for even dancing imitates character, emotion, and action, by rhythmical movement.

There is another art which imitates by means of language alone, and that either in prose or verse—which 1447
verse, again, may either combine different metres or consist of but one kind—but this has hitherto been without a name. For there is no common term we could apply to the mimes of Sophron and Xenarchus and the Socratic dialogues on the one hand; and, on the other, to poetic imitations in iambic, elegiac, or any similar metre. People do, indeed, add the word 'maker' or 'poet' to the name of the metre, and speak of elegiac poets, or epic (that is, hexameter) poets, as if it were not the imitation that makes the poet, but the verse that entitles them all indiscriminately to the name. Even when a treatise on medicine or natural science is brought out in verse, the name of poet is by custom given to the author; and yet Homer and Empedocles have nothing in common but the metre, so that it would be right to call the one poet, the other physicist rather than poet. On the same principle, even if a writer in his poetic imitation were to combine all metres, as Chaeremon did in his Centaur, which is a medley composed of metres of all kinds, we should bring him too under the general term poet. So much then for these distinctions.

There are, again, some arts which employ all the 10 means above mentioned,—namely, rhythm, tune and metre. Such are Dithyrambic and Nomic poetry, and also Tragedy and Comedy; but between them the difference is, that in the first two cases these means are all employed in combination, in the latter, now one means is employed, now another.

Such, then, are the differences of the arts with respect to the medium of imitation.

II

Since the objects of imitation are men in action, and these men must be either of a higher or a lower type (for moral character mainly answers to these divisions, goodness and badness being the distinguishing marks of moral differences), it follows that we must represent men either as better than in real life, or as worse, or as they are. It is the same in painting. Polygnote depicted men as nobler than they are, Pauson as less noble, Dionysius drew them true to life.

Now it is evident that each of the modes of imitation 2 above mentioned will exhibit these differences, and become a distinct kind in imitating objects that are thus distinct. Such diversities may be found even in dancing, 3 flute-playing, and lyre-playing. So again in language, whether prose or verse unaccompanied by music. Homer, for example, makes men better than they are; Cleophon as they are; Hegemon the Thasian, the inventor of parodies, and Nicochares, the author of the Deiliad, worse than they are. The same thing holds good of Dithyrambs 4 and Nomes; here too one may portray different types, as Timotheus and Philoxenus differed in representing their Cyclopes. The same distinction marks off Tragedy from Comedy; for Comedy aims at representing men as worse, Tragedy as better than in actual life.

III There is still a third difference—the manner in which each of these objects may be imitated. For the medium being the same, and the objects the same, the poet may imitate by narration—in which case he can either take another personality as Homer does, or speak in his own person, unchanged—or he may present all his characters as living and moving before us.

These, then, as we said at the beginning, are the 2 three differences which distinguish artistic imitation,—the medium, the objects, and the manner. So that from one point of view, Sophocles is an imitator of the same kind as Homer—for both imitate higher types of character; from another point of view, of the same kind as Aristophanes—for both imitate persons acting and doing. Hence, some say, the name of 'drama' is given 3 to such poems, as representing action. For the same reason the Dorians claim the invention both of Tragedy and Comedy. The claim to Comedy is put forward by the Megarians,—not only by those of Greece proper, who allege that it originated under their democracy, but also by the Megarians of Sicily, for the poet Epicharmus, who is much earlier than Chionides and Magnes, belonged to that country. Tragedy too is claimed by certain Dorians of the Peloponnese. In each case they appeal to the evidence of language. Villages, they say, are by them called κῶμαι, by the Athenians δῆμοι: and they assume that Comedians were so named not from κωμάζειν, 'to revel,' but because they wandered from village to village (κατὰ κώμας), being excluded contemptuously from the city. They add also that the Dorian word for 'doing' is δρᾶν, and the Athenian, πράττειν.

This may suffice as to the number and nature of the various modes of imitation.

IV Poetry in general seems to have sprung from two causes, each of them lying deep in our nature. First, the instinct of imitation is implanted in man from childhood, one difference between him and other animals being that he is the most imitative of living creatures; and through imitation he learns his earliest lessons; and no less universal is the pleasure felt in things imitated. We have evidence of this in the facts of experience. Objects which in themselves we view with pain, we delight to contemplate when reproduced with minute fidelity: such as the forms of the most ignoble animals and of dead bodies. The cause of this again is, that to learn gives the liveliest pleasure, not only to philosophers but to men in general; whose capacity, however, of learning is more limited. Thus the reason why men enjoy seeing a likeness is, that in contemplating it they find themselves learning or inferring, and saying perhaps, 'Ah, that is he.' For if you happen not to have seen the original, the pleasure will be due not to the imitation as such, but to the execution, the colouring, or some such other cause.

Imitation, then, is one instinct of our nature. Next, there is the instinct for 'harmony' and rhythm, metres being manifestly sections of rhythm. Persons, therefore, starting with this natural gift developed by degrees their special aptitudes, till their rude improvisations gave birth to Poetry.

Poetry now diverged in two directions, according to the individual character of the writers. The graver spirits imitated noble actions, and the actions of good men. The more trivial sort imitated the actions of meaner persons, at first composing satires, as the former did hymns to the gods and the praises of famous men. A poem of the satirical kind cannot indeed be put down to any author earlier than Homer; though many such writers probably there were. But from Homer onward, instances can be cited,—his own Margites, for example, and other similar compositions. The appropriate metre was also here introduced; hence the measure is still called the iambic or lampooning measure, being that in which people lampooned one another. Thus the older poets were distinguished as writers of heroic or of lampooning verse.

As, in the serious style, Homer is pre-eminent among poets, for he alone combined dramatic form with excellence of imitation, so he too first laid down the main lines of Comedy, by dramatising the ludicrous instead of writing personal satire. His Margites bears the same relation to Comedy that the Iliad and Odyssey do to Tragedy. But when Tragedy and Comedy came to light, the two classes of poets still followed their natural bent: the lampooners became writers of Comedy, and the Epic poets were succeeded by Tragedians, since the drama was a larger and higher form of art.

types or not; and whether it is to be judged in itself, or in relation also to the audience,—this raises another question. Be that as it may, Tragedy—as also Comedy 12—was at first mere improvisation. The one originated with the leaders of the Dithyramb, the other with those of the phallic songs, which are still in use in many of our cities. Tragedy advanced by slow degrees; each new element that showed itself was in turn developed. Having passed through many changes, it found its natural form, and there it stopped.

Aeschylus first introduced a second actor; he diminished 13 the importance of the Chorus, and assigned the leading part to the dialogue. Sophocles raised the number of actors to three, and added scene-painting. Moreover, 14 it was not till late that the short plot was discarded for one of greater compass, and the grotesque diction of the earlier satyric form for the stately manner of Tragedy. The iambic measure then replaced the trochaic tetrameter, which was originally employed when the poetry was of the satyric order, and had greater affinities with dancing. Once dialogue had come in, Nature herself discovered the appropriate measure. For the iambic is, of all measures, the most colloquial: we see it in the fact that conversational speech runs into iambic form more frequently than into any other kind of verse; rarely into hexameters, and only when we drop the colloquial intonation. The additions to the number of 'episodes' or acts, and the other improvements of which tradition tells, must be taken as already described; for to discuss them in detail would, doubtless, be a large undertaking.

V Comedy is, as we have said, an imitation of characters of a lower type,—not, however, in the full sense of the word bad, the Ludicrous being merely a subdivision of the ugly. It consists in some defect or ugliness which is not painful or destructive. To take an obvious example, the comic mask is ugly and distorted, but does not imply pain.

The successive changes through which Tragedy passed, and the authors of these changes, are well known, whereas Comedy has had no history, because it was not at first 1449 b treated seriously. It was late before the Archon granted a comic chorus to a poet; the performers were till then voluntary. Comedy had already taken definite shape when comic poets, distinctively so called, are heard of. Who introduced masks, or prologues, or increased the number of actors,—these and other similar details remain unknown. As for the plot, it came originally from Sicily; but of Athenian writers Crates was the first who, abandoning the 'iambic' or lampooning form, generalised his themes and plots.

Epic poetry agrees with Tragedy in so far as it is an imitation in verse of characters of a higher type. They differ, in that Epic poetry admits but one kind of metre, and is narrative in form. They differ, again, in their length: for Tragedy endeavours, as far as possible, to confine itself to a single revolution of the sun, or but slightly to exceed this limit; whereas the Epic action has no limits of time. This, then, is a second point of difference; though at first the same freedom was admitted in Tragedy as in Epic poetry.

Of their constituent parts some are common to both, some peculiar to Tragedy. Whoever, therefore, knows what is good or bad Tragedy, knows also about Epic poetry: for all the elements of an Epic poem are found in Tragedy, but the elements of a Tragedy are not all found in the Epic poem.

VI Of the poetry which imitates in hexameter verse, and of Comedy, we will speak hereafter. Let us now discuss Tragedy, resuming its formal definition, as resulting from what has been already said.

Tragedy, then, is an imitation of an action that is serious, complete, and of a certain magnitude; in language embellished with each kind of artistic ornament, the several kinds being found in separate parts of the play; in the form of action, not of narrative; through pity and fear effecting the proper purgation of these emotions. By 'language embellished,' I mean language into which rhythm, 'harmony,' and song enter. By 'the several kinds in separate parts,' I mean, that some parts are rendered through the medium of verse alone, others again with the aid of song.

Now as tragic imitation implies persons acting, it necessarily follows, in the first place, that Spectacular equipment will be a part of Tragedy. Next, Song and Diction, for these are the medium of imitation. By 'Diction'

I mean the mere metrical arrangement of the words : as for 'Song,' it is a term whose sense every one understands.

Again, Tragedy is the imitation of an action ; and an action implies personal agents, who necessarily possess certain distinctive qualities both of character and thought ; 1450 a for it is by these that we qualify actions themselves, and these—thought and character—are the two natural causes from which actions spring, and on actions again all success or failure depends. Hence, the Plot is the imitation of the action :—for by plot I here mean the arrangement of the incidents. By Character I mean that in virtue of which we ascribe certain qualities to the agents. Thought is required wherever a statement is proved, or, it may be, a general truth enunciated. Every Tragedy, therefore, must have six parts, which 7 parts determine its quality—namely, Plot, Character, Diction, Thought, Spectacle, Song. Two of the parts constitute the medium of imitation, one the manner, and three the objects of imitation. And these complete the list. These elements have been employed, we may say, by the 8 poets to a man ; in fact, every play contains Spectacular elements as well as Character, Plot, Diction, Song, and Thought.

But most important of all is the structure of the 9

incidents. For Tragedy is an imitation, not of men, but of an action and of life, and life consists in action, and its end is a mode of action, not a quality. Now 10 character determines men's qualities, but it is by their actions that they are happy or the reverse. Dramatic action, therefore, is not with a view to the representation of character: character comes in as subsidiary to the actions. Hence the incidents and the plot are the end of a tragedy; and the end is the chief thing of all. Again, 11 without action there cannot be a tragedy; there may be without character. The tragedies of most of our modern poets fail in the rendering of character; and of poets in general this is often true. It is the same in painting; and here lies the difference between Zeuxis and Polygnotus. Polygnotus delineates character well: the style of Zeuxis is devoid of ethical quality. Again, if you string 12 together a set of speeches expressive of character, and well finished in point of diction and thought, you will not produce the essential tragic effect nearly so well as with a play which, however deficient in these respects, yet has a plot and artistically constructed incidents. Besides which, the most powerful elements of emotional 13 interest in Tragedy—Peripeteia or Reversal of Intention, and Recognition scenes—are parts of the plot. A further 14 proof is, that novices in the art attain to finish of diction and precision of portraiture before they can construct the plot. It is the same with almost all the early poets.

The Plot, then, is the first principle, and, as it were, the soul of a tragedy: Character holds the second place.

 1450 b A similar fact is seen in painting. The most beautiful 15 colours, laid on confusedly, will not give as much pleasure as the chalk outline of a portrait. Thus Tragedy is the imitation of an action, and of the agents, mainly with a view to the action.

Third in order is Thought,—that is, the faculty of 16 saying what is possible and pertinent in given circumstances. In the case of oratory, this is the function of the political art and of the art of rhetoric: and so indeed the older poets make their characters speak the language of civic life; the poets of our time, the language of the rhetoricians. Character is that which reveals moral 17 purpose, showing what kind of things a man chooses or avoids. Speeches, therefore, which do not make this manifest, or in which the speaker does not choose or avoid anything whatever, are not expressive of character.
 Thought, on the other hand, is found where something is proved to be or not to be, or a general maxim is enunciated.

Fourth among the elements enumerated comes 18 Diction; by which I mean, as has been already said, the expression of the meaning, in words; and its essence is the same both in verse and prose.

Of the remaining elements Song holds the chief place 19
 among the embellishments.

The Spectacle has, indeed, an emotional attraction of its own, but, of all the parts, it is the least artistic, and connected least with the art of poetry. For the power of Tragedy, we may be sure, is felt even apart from representation and actors. Besides, the production of spectacular effects depends more on the art of the stage machinist than on that of the poet.

VII These principles being established, let us now discuss the proper structure of the Plot, since this is the first and most important part of Tragedy.

Now, according to our definition, Tragedy is an <sup>2</sup> imitation of an action that is complete, and whole, and of a certain magnitude; for there may be a whole that is wanting in magnitude. A whole is that which has <sup>3</sup> a beginning, a middle, and an end. A beginning is that which does not itself follow anything by causal necessity, but after which something naturally is or comes to be. An end, on the contrary, is that which itself naturally follows some other thing, either by necessity, or as a rule, but has nothing following it. A middle is that which follows something as some other thing follows it. A well constructed plot, therefore, must neither begin nor end at haphazard, but conform to these principles.

Again, a beautiful object, whether it be a picture of <sup>4</sup> a living organism or any whole composed of parts, must not only have an orderly arrangement of parts, but must also be of a certain magnitude; for beauty depends on magnitude and order. Hence an exceedingly small picture cannot be beautiful; for the view of it is confused, the object being seen in an almost imperceptible moment of time. Nor, again, can one of vast size be <sup>1451</sup> a beautiful; for as the eye cannot take it all in at once, the unity and sense of the whole is lost for the spectator; as for instance if there were a picture a thousand miles long. As, therefore, in the case of animate bodies and <sup>5</sup> pictures a certain magnitude is necessary, and a magnitude which may be easily embraced in one view; so in the plot, a certain length is necessary, and a length which can be easily embraced by the memory. The 6 limit of length in relation to dramatic competition and sensuous presentment, is no part of artistic theory. For had it been the rule for a hundred tragedies to compete together, the performance would have been regulated by the water-clock,—as indeed we are told was formerly done. But the limit as fixed by the nature of the 7 drama itself is this:—the greater the length, the more beautiful will the piece be by reason of its size, provided that the whole be perspicuous. And to define the matter roughly, we may say that the proper magnitude is comprised within such limits, that the sequence of events, according to the law of probability or necessity, will admit of a change from bad fortune to good, or from good fortune to bad.

VIII      Unity of plot does not, as some persons think, consist in the unity of the hero. For infinitely various are the incidents in one man's life, which cannot be reduced to unity; and so, too, there are many actions of one man out of which we cannot make one action. Hence the 2 error, as it appears, of all, poets who have composed a Heracleid, a Theseid, or other poems of the kind. They imagine that as Heracles was one man, the story of Heracles must also be a unity. But Homer, as in all 3 else he is of surpassing merit, here too—whether from art or natural genius—seems to have happily discerned the truth. In composing the Odyssey he did not include all the adventures of Odysseus—such as his wound on Parnassus, or his feigned madness at the mustering of the host—incidents between which there was no necessary or probable connexion: but he made the Odyssey, and likewise the Iliad, to centre round an action that in our sense of the word is one. As therefore, in the other 4 imitative arts, the imitation is one when the object imitated is one, so the plot, being an imitation of an action, must imitate one action and that a whole, the structural union of the parts being such that, if any one of them is displaced or removed, the whole will be disjointed and disturbed. For a thing whose presence or absence makes no visible difference, is not an organic part of the whole.

IX It is, moreover, evident from what has been said, that it is not the function of the poet to relate what has happened, but what may happen,—what is possible according to the law of probability or necessity. The 2 1451 b poet and the historian differ not by writing in verse or in prose. The work of Herodotus might be put into verse, and it would still be a species of history, with metre no less than without it. The true difference is that one relates what has happened, the other what may happen. Poetry, therefore, is a more philosophical and 3 a higher thing than history: for poetry tends to express the universal, history the particular. By the universal 4 I mean how a person of a certain type will on occasion speak or act, according to the law of probability or necessity; and it is this universality at which poetry aims in the names she attaches to the personages. The particular is—for example—what Alcibiades did or suffered. In Comedy this is already apparent: for here 5 the poet first constructs the plot on the lines of probability, and then inserts characteristic names ;—unlike the lampooners who write about particular individuals. But tragedians still keep to real names, the reason being 6 that what is possible is credible : what has not happened we do not at once feel sure to be possible : but what has happened is manifestly possible : otherwise it would not have happened. Still there are some tragedies in which 7 there are only one or two well known names, the rest being fictitious. In others, none are well known,—as in Agathon's Antheus, where incidents and names alike are fictitious, and yet they give none the less pleasure. We must not, therefore, at all costs keep to the received 8 legends, which are the usual subjects of Tragedy. Indeed, it would be absurd to attempt it ; for even subjects that are known are known only to a few, and yet give pleasure to all. It clearly follows that the poet or 'maker' 9 should be the maker of plots rather than of verses ; since he is a poet because he imitates, and what he imitates are actions. And even if he chances to take an historical subject, he is none the less a poet ; for there is no reason why some events that have actually happened should not conform to the law of the probable and possible, and in virtue of that quality in them he is their poet or maker.

I call a plot 'episodic' in which the episodes or acts succeed one another without probable or necessary sequence. Bad poets compose such pieces by their own fault, good poets, to please the players; for, as they write show pieces for competition, they stretch the plot beyond its capacity, and are often forced to break the natural continuity.

But again, Tragedy is an imitation not only of a complete action, but of events terrible and pitiful. Such an effect is best produced when the events come on us by surprise; and the effect is heightened when, at the same time, they follow as cause and effect. The tragic wonder will then be greater than if they happened of themselves or by accident; for even coincidences are most striking when they have an air of design. We may instance the statue of Mitys at Argos, which fell upon his murderer while he was a spectator at a festival, and killed him. Such events seem not to be due to mere chance. Plots, therefore, constructed on these principles are necessarily the best.

X Plots are either Simple or Complex, for the actions in real life, of which the plots are an imitation, obviously show a similar distinction. An action which is one and continuous in the sense above defined, I call Simple, when the change of fortune takes place without Reversal of Intention and without Recognition.

A Complex action is one in which the change is accompanied by such Reversal, or by Recognition, or by both. These last should arise from the internal structure of the plot, so that what follows should be the necessary or probable result of the preceding action. It makes all the difference whether any given event is a case of propter hoc or post hoc.

XI Reversal of Intention is a change by which the action veers round to its opposite, subject always to our rule of probability or necessity. Thus in the Oedipus, the messenger comes to cheer Oedipus and free him from his alarms about his mother, but by revealing who he is, he produces the opposite effect. Again in the Lynceus, Lynceus is being led away to his death, and Danaus goes with him, meaning to slay him; but the outcome of the action is, that Danaus is killed and Lynceus saved.

Recognition, as the name indicates, is a change from 2 ignorance to knowledge, producing love or hate between the persons destined by the poet for good or bad fortune. The best form of recognition is coincident with a Reversal of Intention, as in the Oedipus. There are indeed other 3 forms. Even inanimate things of the most trivial kind may sometimes be objects of recognition. Again, we may recognise or discover whether a person has done a thing or not. But the recognition which is most intimately connected with the plot and action is, as we have said, the recognition of persons. This recognition, combined 4
1452 b with Reversal, will produce either pity or fear; and actions producing these effects are those which, by our definition, Tragedy represents. Moreover, it is upon such situations that the issues of good or bad fortune will depend.

Recognition, then, being between persons, it may happen 5 that one person only is recognised by the other—when the latter is already known—or it may be necessary that the recognition should be on both sides. Thus Iphigenia is revealed to Orestes by the sending of the letter; but another act of recognition is required to make Orestes known to Iphigenia.

Two parts, then, of the Plot—Reversal of Intention 6 and Recognition—turn upon surprises. A third part is the Tragic Incident. The Tragic Incident is a destructive or painful action, such as death on the stage, bodily agony, wounds and the like.

XII [The parts of Tragedy which must be treated as elements of the whole, have been already mentioned. We now come to the quantitative parts—the separate parts into which Tragedy is divided—namely, Prologue, Episode, Exodos, Choric song; this last being divided into Parodos and Stasimon. These are common to all plays: peculiar to some are the songs of actors from the stage and the Commoi.

The Prologos is that entire part of a tragedy which 2 precedes the Parodos of the Chorus. The Episode is that entire part of a tragedy which is between complete choric songs. The Exodos is that entire part of a tragedy which has no choric song after it. Of the Choric part the Parodos is the first undivided utterance of the Chorus: the Stasimon is a Choric ode without anapaests or trochaic tetrameters: the Commos is a joint lamentation of Chorus and actors. The parts of Tragedy which 3 must be treated as elements of the whole have been

XIII As the sequel to what has already been said, we must proceed to consider what the poet should aim at, and what he should avoid, in constructing his plots; and by what means the specific effect of Tragedy will be produced.

A perfect tragedy should, as we have seen, be arranged <sup>2</sup> not on the simple but on the complex plan. It should, moreover, imitate actions which excite pity and fear, this being the distinctive mark of tragic imitation. It follows plainly, in the first place, that the change of fortune presented must not be the spectacle of a virtuous man brought from prosperity to adversity: for this moves neither pity nor fear; it merely shocks us. Nor, again, that of a bad man passing from adversity to prosperity: for nothing can be more alien to the spirit of Tragedy; it <sup>1453 a</sup> possesses no single tragic quality; it neither satisfies the moral sense, nor calls forth pity or fear. Nor, again, should the downfall of the utter villain be exhibited. A plot of this kind would, doubtless, satisfy the moral sense, but it would inspire neither pity nor fear; for pity is aroused by unmerited misfortune, fear by the misfortune of a man like ourselves. Such an event, therefore, will be neither pitiful nor terrible. There remains, then, the character between these two <sup>3</sup> extremes,—that of a man who is not eminently good and just, yet whose misfortune is brought about not by vice or depravity, but by some error or frailty. He must be one who is highly renowned and prosperous,—a personage like Oedipus, Thyestes, or other illustrious men of such families.

A well constructed plot should, therefore, be single <sup>4</sup> in its issue, rather than double as some maintain. The change of fortune should be not from bad to good, but, reversely, from good to bad. It should come about as the result not of vice, but of some great error or frailty, in a character either such as we have described, or better rather than worse. The practice of the stage bears out <sup>5</sup> our view. At first the poets recounted any legend that came in their way. Now, the best tragedies are founded on the story of a few houses,—on the fortunes of Alcmaeon, Oedipus, Orestes, Meleager, Thyestes, Telephus, and those others who have done or suffered something terrible. A tragedy, then, to be perfect according to the rules of art should be of this construction. Hence they are in error <sup>6</sup> who censure Euripides just because he follows this principle in his plays, many of which end unhappily. It is, as we have said, the right ending. The best proof is that on the stage and in dramatic competition, such plays, if well worked out, are the most tragic in effect; and Euripides, faulty though he may be in the general management of his subject, yet is felt to be the most <sup>7</sup> tragic of the poets.

In the second rank comes the kind of tragedy which <sup>7</sup> some place first. Like the Odyssey, it has a double thread of plot, and also an opposite catastrophe for the good and for the bad. It is accounted the best because of the weakness of the spectators; for the poet is guided in what he writes by the wishes of his audience. The <sup>8</sup> pleasure, however, thence derived is not the true tragic pleasure. It is proper rather to Comedy, where those who, in the piece, are the deadliest enemies—like Orestes and Aegisthus—quit the stage as friends at the close, and no one slays or is slain.

XIV
1453<sup>b</sup> Fear and pity may be aroused by spectacular means; but they may also result from the inner structure of the piece, which is the better way, and indicates a superior poet. For the plot ought to be so constructed that, even without the aid of the eye, he who hears the tale told will thrill with horror and melt to pity at what takes place. This is the impression we should receive from hearing the story of the Oedipus. But to produce this effect by the mere spectacle is a less artistic method, and dependent on extraneous aids. Those who employ spectacular means to create a sense not of the terrible but only of the monstrous, are strangers to the purpose of Tragedy; for we must not demand of Tragedy any and every kind of pleasure, but only that which is proper to it. And since the pleasure which the poet should afford is that which comes from pity and fear through imitation, it is evident that this quality must be impressed upon the incidents.

Let us then determine what are the circumstances which strike us as terrible or pitiful.

Actions capable of this effect must happen between persons who are either friends or enemies or indifferent to one another. If an enemy kills an enemy, there is nothing to excite pity either in the act or the intention, —except so far as the suffering in itself is pitiful. So again with indifferent persons. But when the tragic incident occurs between those who are near or dear to one another—if, for example, a brother kills, or intends to kill, a brother, a son his father, a mother her son, a son his mother, or any other deed of the kind is done—these are the situations to be looked for by the poet. He may not indeed destroy the framework of the received legends—the fact, for instance, that Clytemnestra was slain by Orestes and Eriphyle by Alcmaeon—but he ought to show invention of his own, and skilfully handle the traditional material. Let us explain more clearly what is meant by skilful handling.

The action may be done consciously and with knowledge of the persons, in the manner of the older poets. It is thus too that Euripides makes Medea slay her children. Or, again, the deed of horror may be done, but done in ignorance, and the tie of kinship or friendship be discovered afterwards. The Oedipus of Sophocles is an example. Here, indeed, the incident is outside the drama proper; but cases occur where it falls within the action of the play: one may cite the Alcmaeon of Astydamas, or Telegonus in the Wounded Odysseus. Again, there is a third case,—to be about to act with knowledge of the persons and then not to act. The fourth case is when some one is about to do an irreparable deed through ignorance, and makes the discovery before it is done. These are the only possible ways. For the deed must either be done or not done,—and that wittingly or unwittingly. But of all these ways, to be about to act knowing the persons, and then not to act, is the worst. It is shocking without being tragic, for no disaster follows. It is, therefore, never, or very rarely, found in poetry. One instance, however, is in the Antigone, where Haemon threatens to kill Creon. The next and better way is that the deed should be perpetrated. Still better, that it should be perpetrated in ignorance, and the discovery made afterwards. There is then nothing to shock us, while the discovery produces a startling effect. The last case is the best, as when in the Cresphontes Merope is about to slay her son, but, recognising who he is, spares his life. So in the Iphigenia, the sister recognises the brother just in time. Again in the Helle, the son recognises the mother when on the point of giving her up. This, then, is why a few families only, as has been already observed, furnish the subjects of tragedy. It was not art, but happy chance, that led poets to look for such situations and so impress the tragic quality upon their plots. They are compelled, therefore, to have recourse to those houses whose history contains moving incidents like these.

Enough has now been said concerning the structure of the incidents, and the proper constitution of the plot.

XV In respect of Character there are four things to be aimed at. First, and most important, it must be good. Now any speech or action that manifests moral purpose of any kind will be expressive of character: the character will be good if the purpose is good. This rule is relative to each class. Even a woman may be good, and also a slave; though the woman may be said to be an inferior being, and the slave quite worthless. The second thing to aim at is propriety. There is a type of manly valour; but valour in a woman, or unscrupulous cleverness, is inappropriate. Thirdly, character must be true to life: for 3 this is a distinct thing from goodness and propriety, as here described. The fourth point is consistency: for though 4 the subject of the imitation, who suggested the type, be inconsistent, still he must be consistently inconsistent. As an example of motiveless degradation of character, we 5 have Menelaus in the Orestes: of character indecorous and inappropriate, the lament of Odysseus in the Scylla, and the speech of Melanippe: of inconsistency, the Iphigenia at Aulis,—for Iphigenia the suppliant in no way resembles her later self.

As in the structure of the plot, so too in the por- 6 traiture of character, the poet should always aim either at the necessary or the probable. Thus a person of a given character should speak or act in a given way, by the rule either of necessity or of probability; just as this event should follow that by necessary or probable sequence. It is therefore evident that the unravelling 7 of the plot, no less than the complication, must arise out 1454 b of the plot itself, it must not be brought about by the Deus ex Machina—as in the Medea, or in the Return of the Greeks in the Iliad. The Deus ex Machina should be employed only for events external to the drama,—for antecedent or subsequent events, which lie beyond the range of human knowledge, and which require to be reported or foretold ; for to the gods we ascribe the power of seeing all things. Within the action there must be nothing irrational. If the irrational cannot be excluded, it should be outside the scope of the tragedy. Such is the irrational element in the Oedipus of Sophocles.

Again, since Tragedy is an imitation of persons who are above the common level, the example of good portrait-painters should be followed. They, while reproducing the distinctive form of the original, make a likeness which is true to life and yet more beautiful. So too the poet, in representing men who are irascible or indolent, or have other defects of character, should preserve the type and yet ennoble it. In this way Achilles is portrayed by Agathon and Homer.

These then are rules the poet should observe. Nor should he neglect those appeals to the senses, which, though not among the essentials, are the concomitants of poetry ; for here too there is much room for error. But of this enough has been said in the published treatises.

XVI      What Recognition is has been already explained. We will now enumerate its kinds.

First, the least artistic form, which, from poverty of wit, is most commonly employed—recognition by signs. Of these some are congenital,—such as ‘the spear which the earth-born race bear on their bodies,’ or the stars introduced by Carcinus in his Thyestes. Others are acquired after birth ; and of these some are bodily marks, as scars ; some external tokens, as necklaces, or the little ark in the Tyro by which the discovery is effected. Even these admit of more or less skilful treatment. Thus in the recognition of Odysseus by his scar, the discovery is made in one way by the nurse, in another by the herdsmen. The use of tokens for the express purpose of proof—and, indeed, any formal proof with or without tokens—is a less artistic mode of recognition. A better kind is that which comes about by a turn of incident, as in the Bath Scene in the Odyssey.

Next come the recognitions invented at will by the poet, and on that account wanting in art. For example, Orestes in the Iphigenia reveals the fact that he is Orestes. She, indeed, makes herself known by the letter; but he, by speaking himself, and saying what the poet, not what the plot requires. This, therefore, is nearly allied to the fault above mentioned:—for Orestes might as well have brought tokens with him. Another similar instance is the 'voice of the shuttle' in the Tereus of Sophocles.

1455 a The third kind depends on memory when the sight of some object awakens a feeling: as in the Cyprians of Dicaeogenes, where the hero breaks into tears on seeing the picture; or again in the 'Lay of Alcinous,' where Odysseus, hearing the minstrel play the lyre, recalls the past and weeps; and hence the recognition.

The fourth kind is by process of reasoning. Thus in the Choëphori:—'Some one resembling me has come: no one resembles me but Orestes: therefore Orestes has come.' Such too is the discovery made by Iphigenia in the play of Polyidus the Sophist. It was a natural reflexion for Orestes to make, 'So I too must die at the altar like my sister.' So, again, in the Tydeus of Theodectes, the father says, 'I came to find my son, and I lose my own life.' So too in the Phineidae: the women, on seeing the place, inferred their fate:—‘Here we are doomed to die, for here we were cast forth.’ Again, there is a composite kind of recognition involving false inference on the part of one of the characters, as in the Odysseus Disguised as a Messenger. A said <that no one else was able to bend the bow; . . . hence B (the disguised Odysseus) imagined that A would> recognise the bow which, in fact, he had not seen; and to bring about a recognition by this means—the expectation that A would recognise the bow—is false inference.

But, of all recognitions, the best is that which arises from the incidents themselves, where the startling discovery is made by natural means. Such is that in the Oedipus of Sophocles, and in the Iphigenia; for it was natural that Iphigenia should wish to dispatch a letter. These recognitions alone dispense with the artificial aid of tokens or amulets. Next come the recognitions by process of reasoning.

XVII In constructing the plot and working it out with the proper diction, the poet should place the scene, as far as possible, before his eyes. In this way, seeing everything with the utmost vividness, as if he were a spectator of the action, he will discover what is in keeping with it, and be most unlikely to overlook inconsistencies. The need of such a rule is shown by the fault found in Carcinus. Amphiaras was on his way from the temple. This fact escaped the observation of one who did not see the situation. On the stage, however, the piece failed, the audience being offended at the oversight.

Again, the poet should work out his play, to the best of his power, with appropriate gestures; for 2

those who feel emotion are most convincing through natural sympathy with the characters they represent; and one who is agitated storms, one who is angry rages, with the most life-like reality. Hence poetry implies either a happy gift of nature or a strain of madness. In the one case a man can take the mould of any character; in the other, he is lifted out of his proper self.

As for the story, whether the poet takes it ready 3
 1445 b made or constructs it for himself, he should first sketch its general outline, and then fill in the episodes and amplify in detail. The general plan may be illustrated by the Iphigenia. A young girl is sacrificed; she disappears mysteriously from the eyes of those who sacrificed her; she is transported to another country, where the custom is to offer up all strangers to the goddess. To this ministry she is appointed. Some time later her own brother chances to arrive. The fact that the oracle for some reason ordered him to go there, is outside the general plan of the play. The purpose, again, of his coming is outside the action proper. However, he comes, he is seized, and, when on the point of being sacrificed, reveals who he is. The mode of recognition may be either that of Euripides or of Polyidus, in whose play he, exclaims very naturally:—
 'So it was not my sister only, but I too, who was doomed to be sacrificed'; and by that remark he is saved.

After this, the names being once given, it remains 4 to fill in the episodes. We must see that they are relevant to the action. In the case of Orestes, for example, there is the madness which led to his capture, and his deliverance by means of the purificatory rite. In the drama, the episodes are short, but it is these that 5 give extension to Epic poetry. Thus the story of the Odyssey can be stated briefly. A certain man is absent from home for many years; he is jealously watched by Poseidon, and left desolate. Meanwhile his home is in a wretched plight—suitors are wasting his substance and plotting against his son. At length, tempest-tost, he himself arrives; he makes certain persons acquainted with him; he attacks the suitors with his own hand, and is himself preserved while he destroys them. This is the essence of the plot; the rest is episode.

XVIII Every tragedy falls into two parts,—Complication and Unravelling or Dénouement. Incidents extraneous to the action are frequently combined with a portion of the action proper, to form the Complication; the rest is the Unravelling. By the Complication I mean all that extends from the beginning of the action and the part which marks the turning-point to good or bad fortune. The Unravelling is that which extends from the beginning of the change to the end. Thus, in the Lynceus of Theodectes, the Complication consists of the incidents presupposed in the drama, the seizure of the child, and then again * * <The Unravelling> extends from the accusation of murder to the end.

There are four kinds of Tragedy, the Complex,<sup>2</sup> depending entirely on Reversal and Recognition; the 1456 a Pathetic (where the motive is passion),—such as the tragedies on Ajax and Ixion; the Ethical (where the motives are ethical),—such as the Phthioides and the Peleus. The fourth kind is the Simple. <We here exclude the purely spectacular element>, exemplified by the Phoroides, the Prometheus, and scenes laid in Hades. The poet should endeavour, if possible, to combine all 3 poetic merits; or failing that, the greatest number and those the most important; the more so, in face of the cavilling criticism of the day. For whereas there have hitherto been good poets, each in his own branch, the critics now expect one man to surpass all others in their several lines of excellence.

In speaking of a tragedy as the same or different, the best test to take is the plot. Identity exists where the Complication and Unravelling are the same. Many poets tie the knot well, but unravel it ill. Both arts, however, should always be mastered.

Again, the poet should remember what has been often 4 said, and not make a Tragedy into an Epic structure. By an Epic structure I mean one with a multiplicity of plots: as if, for instance, you were to make a tragedy out of the entire story of the Iliad. In the Epic poem, owing to its length, each part assumes its proper magnitude. In the drama the result is far from answering to the poet's expectation. The proof is that 5 the poets who have dramatised the whole story of the Fall of Troy, instead of selecting portions, like Euripides; or who have taken the whole tale of Niobe, and not a part of her story, like Aeschylus, either fail utterly or meet with poor success on the stage. Even Agathon has been known to fail from this one defect. In his Reversals of Intention, however, he shows a marvellous skill in the effort to hit the popular taste,—to produce a tragic effect that satisfies the moral sense. This effect is produced when the clever rogue, like Sisyphus, is outwitted, or the brave villain defeated. Such an event is probable in Agathon's sense of the word: 'it is probable,' he says, 'that many things should happen contrary to probability.'

The Chorus too should be regarded as one of the actors; it should be an integral part of the whole, and share in the action, in the manner not of Euripides but of Sophocles. As for the later poets, their choral songs pertain as little to the subject of the piece as to that of any other tragedy. They are, therefore, sung as mere interludes,—a practice first begun by Agathon. Yet what difference is there between introducing such choral interludes, and transferring a speech, or even a whole act, from one play to another?

XIX It remains to speak of Diction and Thought, the other parts of Tragedy having been already discussed. Concerning Thought, we may assume what is said in the Rhetoric, to which inquiry the subject more strictly belongs. Under Thought is included every effect which has to be produced by speech, the subdivisions being,— 2 proof and refutation; the excitation of the feelings, such importance or its opposite. Now, it is evident that <sup>3</sup> the dramatic incidents must be treated from the same points of view as the dramatic speeches, when the object is to evoke the sense of pity, fear, importance, or probability. The only difference is, that the incidents should speak for themselves without verbal exposition; while the effects aimed at in speech should be produced by the speaker, and as a result of the speech. For what were the business of a speaker, if the Thought were revealed quite apart from what he says?

Next, as regards Diction. One branch of the inquiry <sup>4</sup> treats of the Modes of Expression. But this province of knowledge belongs to the art of Delivery, and to the masters of that science. It includes, for instance, —what is a command, a prayer, a narrative, a threat, a question, an answer, and so forth. To know or not <sup>5</sup> to know these things involves no serious censure upon the poet's art. For who can admit the fault imputed to Homer by Protagoras,—that in the words, 'Sing, goddess, of the wrath,' he gives a command under the idea that he utters a prayer? For to tell some one to do a thing or not to do it is, he says, a command. We may, therefore, pass this over as an inquiry that belongs to another art, not to poetry.

sounds. For even brutes utter indivisible sounds, none of which I call a letter. The sound I mean may be 3 either a vowel, a semi-vowel, or a mute. A vowel is that which without impact of tongue or lip has an audible sound. A semi-vowel, that which with such impact has an audible sound, as S and R. A mute, that which with such impact has by itself no sound, but joined to a vowel sound becomes audible, as G and D. These are distinguished according to the form 4 assumed by the mouth, and the place where they are produced; according as they are aspirated or smooth, long or short; as they are acute, grave, or of an intermediate tone; which inquiry belongs in detail to a treatise on metre.

A Syllable is a non-significant sound, composed of a 5 mute and a vowel: for GR without A is a syllable, as also with A,—GRA. But the investigation of these differences belongs also to metrical science.

A Connecting word is a non-significant sound, which 6 1457 a neither causes nor hinders the union of many sounds into one significant sound; it may be placed at either end or in the middle of a sentence. Or, a non-significant sound, which out of several sounds, each of them significant, is capable of forming one significant sound,—as ἀμφί, περί, and the like. Or, a non-significant sound, 7 which marks the beginning, end, or division of a sentence; such, however, that it cannot correctly stand by itself at the beginning of a sentence,—as μέν, ἤτοι, δέ.

A Noun is a composite significant sound, not marking 8 time, of which no part is in itself significant: for in double or compound words we do not employ the separate parts as if each were in itself significant. Thus in Theodorus, 'god-given,' the δῶρον or 'gift' is not in itself significant.

A Verb is a composite significant sound, marking 9 time, in which, as in the noun, no part is in itself significant. For 'man,' or 'white' does not express the idea of 'when'; but 'he walks,' or 'he has walked' does connote time, present or past.

Inflexion belongs both to the noun and verb, and 10 expresses either the relation 'of,' 'to,' or the like; or that of number, whether one or many, as 'man' or 'men'; or the modes or tones in actual delivery, e.g. a question or a command. 'Did he go?' and 'go' are verbal inflexions of this kind.

A Sentence or Phrase is a composite significant 11 sound, some at least of whose parts are in themselves significant; for not every such group of words consists of verbs and nouns—'the definition of man,' for example—but it may dispense even with the verb. Still it will always have some significant part, as 'in walking,' or 'Cleon son of Cleon.' A sentence or phrase may form 12. a unity in two ways,—either as signifying one thing, or as consisting of several parts linked together. Thus the Iliad is one by the linking together of parts, the definition of man by the unity of the thing signified.]

XXI Words are of two kinds, simple and double. By simple I mean those composed of non-significant elements, such as γῆ. By double or compound, those composed either of a significant and non-significant element (though within the whole word no element is significant), or of elements that are both significant. A word may likewise be triple, quadruple, or multiple in form, like 1457 b so many Massilian expressions, e.g. 'Hermo-caico-xanthus <who prayed to Father Zeus.>'

Every word is either current, or strange, or meta-2 phorical, or ornamental, or newly-coined, or lengthened, or contracted, or altered.

By a current or proper word I mean one which is 3 in general use among a people; by a strange word, one which is in use in another country. Plainly, therefore, the same word may be at once strange and current, but not in relation to the same people. The word σίγυρον, 'lance,' is to the Cyprians a current term but to us a strange one.

Metaphor is the application of an alien name by 4 transference either from genus to species, or from species to genus, or from species to species, or by analogy, that is, proportion. Thus from genus to species, as: 'There lies 5 my ship'; for lying at anchor is a species of lying. From species to genus, as: 'Verily ten thousand noble deeds hath Odysseus wrought'; for ten thousand is a species of large number, and is here used for a large number generally. From species to species, as: 'With blade of bronze drew away the life,' and 'Cleft the water with the vessel of unyielding bronze.' Here ἀρύσαι, 'to draw away,' is used for ραμῆν, 'to cleave,' and ραμῆν again for ἀρύσαι,—each being a species of taking away. Analogy or proportion is when the second term is to the 6 first as the fourth to the third. We may then use the fourth for the second, or the second for the fourth. Sometimes too we qualify the metaphor by adding the term to which the proper word is relative. Thus the cup is to Dionysus as the shield to Ares. The cup may, therefore, be called 'the shield of Dionysus,' and the shield 'the cup of Ares.' Or, again, as old age is to life, so is evening to day. Evening may therefore be called 'the old age of the day,' and old age, 'the evening of life,' or, in the phrase of Empedocles, 'life's setting sun.' For some of the terms of the proportion there is at times 7 no word in existence; still the metaphor may be used. For instance, to scatter seed is called sowing: but the action of the sun in scattering his rays is nameless. Still this process bears to the sun the same relation as sowing to the seed. Hence the expression of the poet 'sowing the god-created light.' There is another way in which 8 this kind of metaphor may be employed. We may apply an alien term, and then deny of that term one of its proper attributes; as if we were to call the shield, not 'the cup of Ares,' but 'the wineless cup.'

<An ornamental word . . . >

A newly-coined word is one which has never been even in local use, but is adopted by the poet himself. Some such words there appear to be: as ἐρνύγες, 'sprouters,' for κέρατα, 'horns,' and ἀρητήρ, 'supplicator,' for ἱερεύς, 'priest.'

1458 a A word is lengthened when its own vowel is exchanged 10 for a longer one, or when a syllable is inserted. A word is contracted when some part of it is removed. Instances of lengthening are,—πόλῃος for πόλεως, and Πηληιάδεω for Πηλείδου: of contraction,—κρί, δῶ, and ὄψ, as in μία γίνεται ἀμφοτέρων ὄψ.

An altered word is one in which part of the ordinary 11 form is left unchanged, and part is re-cast; as in δεξιτερὸν κατὰ μᾶζόν, δεξιτερόν is for δεξιόν.

[Nouns in themselves are either masculine, feminine, 12 or neuter. Masculine are such as end in ν, ρ, σ, or in some letter compounded with σ,—these being two, ψ and ξ. Feminine, such as end in vowels that are always long, namely η and ω, and—of vowels that admit of lengthening—those in α. Thus the number of letters in which nouns masculine and feminine end is the same; for ψ and ξ are equivalent to endings in σ. No noun ends in a mute or vowel short by nature. Three only end in ι,—μέλι, κόμμι, πέπερι: five end in υ. Neuter nouns end in these two latter vowels; also in ν and σ.]

XXII The perfection of style is to be clear without being mean. The clearest style is that which uses only current or proper words; at the same time it is mean:—witness the poetry of Cleophon and of Sthenelus. That diction, on the other hand, is lofty and raised above the common-place which employs unusual words. By unusual, I mean strange (or rare) words, metaphorical, lengthened,—anything, in short, that differs from the normal idiom. Yet a style wholly composed of such words is either a riddle or a jargon; a riddle, if it consists of metaphors; a jargon, if it consists of strange (or rare) words. For the essence of a riddle is to express true facts under impossible combinations. Now this cannot be done by any arrangement of ordinary words, but by the use of metaphor it can. Such is the riddle:—‘A man I saw who on another man had glued the bronze by aid of fire,’ and others of the same kind. A diction that is made up of strange (or rare) terms is a jargon. A certain infusion, therefore, of these elements is necessary to style; for the strange (or rare) word, the metaphorical, the ornamental, and the other kinds above mentioned, will raise it above the commonplace and mean, while the use of proper words will make it perspicuous. But nothing contributes 4

1458 b more to produce a clearness of diction that is remote from commonness than the lengthening, contraction, and alteration of words. For by deviating in exceptional cases from the normal idiom, the language will gain distinction; while, at the same time, the partial conformity with usage will give perspicuity. The critics, 5 therefore, are in error who censure these licenses of speech, and hold the author up to ridicule. Thus Eucleides, the elder, declared that it would be an easy matter to be a poet if you might lengthen syllables at will. He caricatured the practice in the very form of his diction, as in the verse:

To employ such license at all obtrusively is, no doubt, grotesque; but in any mode of poetic diction there must be moderation. Even metaphors, strange (or rare) words, or any similar forms of speech, would produce the like effect if used without propriety, and with the express purpose of being ludicrous. How great a difference is made by the appropriate use of lengthening, may be seen in Epic poetry by the insertion of ordinary forms in the verse. So, again, if we take a strange (or rare) word, a metaphor, or any similar mode of expression, and replace it by the current or proper term, the truth of our observation will be manifest. For example Aeschylus and Euripides each composed the same iambic line. But the alteration of a single word by Euripides, who employed the rarer term instead of the ordinary one, makes one verse appear beautiful and the other trivial. Aeschylus in his Philoctetes says:

φαγέδαινα <δ> ἢ μὲν σάρκας ἐσθίει ποδός·

Euripides substitutes θoinâται 'feasts on' for ἐσθίει 'feeds on.' Again, in the line, νῦν δέ μ' ἐὼν ὀλίγος τε καὶ οὐτιδανὸς καὶ ἀεικής, the difference will be felt if we substitute the common words, νῦν δέ μ' ἐὼν μικρός τε καὶ ἀσθενικὸς καὶ ἀειδής.

Or, if for the line,

δίφρον αἰκέλιον καταθείς ὀλίγην τε τράπεζαν,
we read,

Or, for ἡόνες βοόωσιν, ἡόνες κράζουσιν.

Again, Aripheades ridiculed the tragedians for using phrases which no one would employ in ordinary speech: for example, δωμάτων ἄπο instead of ἀπὸ δωμάτων, 1459 σέθεν, ἐγὼ δέ νιν, Ἀχιλλέως πέρι instead of περὶ Ἀχιλλέως, and the like. It is precisely because such phrases are not part of the current idiom that they give distinction to the style. This, however, he failed to see.

It is a great matter to observe propriety in these several modes of expression—compound words, strange (or rare) words, and so forth. But the greatest thing by far is to have a command of metaphor. This alone cannot be imparted by another; it is the mark of genius,—for to make good metaphors implies an eye for resemblances.

Of the various kinds of words, the compound are 10 best adapted to dithyrambs, rare words to heroic poetry, metaphors to iambic. In heroic poetry, indeed, all these varieties are serviceable. But in iambic verse, which reproduces, as far as may be, familiar speech, the most appropriate words are those which are found even in prose. These are,—the current or proper, the metaphorical, the ornamental.

Concerning Tragedy and imitation by means of action this may suffice.

XXIII As to that poetic imitation which is narrative in form and employs a single metre, the plot manifestly ought, as in a tragedy, to be constructed on dramatic principles. It should have for its subject a single action, whole and complete, with a beginning, a middle, and an end. It will thus resemble a single and coherent picture of a living being, and produce the pleasure proper to it. It will differ in structure from historical compositions, which of necessity present not a single action, but a single period, and all that happened within that period to one person or to many, little connected together as the events may be. For as the sea-fight at 2 Salamis and the battle with the Carthaginians in Sicily took place at the same time, but did not tend to any one result, so in the sequence of events, one thing sometimes follows another, and yet no single result is thereby produced. Such is the practice, we may say, of most poets. Here again, then, as has been already 3 observed, the transcendent excellence of Homer is manifest. He never attempts to make the whole war of Troy the subject of his poem, though that war had a beginning and an end. It would have been too vast a theme, and not easily embraced in a single view. If, again, he had kept it within moderate limits, it must have been over-complicated by the variety of the incidents. As it is, he detaches a single portion, and admits as episodes many events from the general story of the war—such as the Catalogue of the ships and others—thus diversifying the poem. All other poets 1450 b take a single hero, a single period, or an action single indeed, but with a multiplicity of parts. Thus did the author of the Cypria and of the Little Iliad. For this<sup>4</sup> reason the Iliad and the Odyssey each furnish the subject of one tragedy, or, at most, of two; while the Cypria supplies materials for many, and the Little Iliad for eight—the Award of the Arms, the Philoctetes, the Neoptolemus, the Eurypylus, the Mendicant Odysseus, the Laconian Women, the Fall of Ilium, the Departure of the Fleet.

XXIV Again, Epic poetry must have as many kinds as Tragedy: it must be simple, or complex, or 'ethical,' or 'pathetic.' The parts also, with the exception of song and scenery, are the same; for it requires Reversals of Intention, Recognitions, and Tragic Incidents. Moreover, the thoughts and the diction must be artistic.<sup>2</sup> In all these respects Homer is our earliest and sufficient model. Indeed each of his poems has a twofold character. The Iliad is at once simple and 'pathetic,' and the Odyssey complex (for Recognition scenes run through it), and at the same time 'ethical.' Moreover, in diction and thought he is supreme.

Epic poetry differs from Tragedy in the scale on<sup>3</sup> which it is constructed, and in its metre. As regards scale or length, we have already laid down an adequate limit:—the beginning and the end must be capable of being brought within a single view. This condition will be satisfied by poems on a smaller scale than the old epics, and answering in length to the group of tragedies presented at a single sitting.

Epic poetry has, however, a great—a special—<sup>4</sup> capacity for enlarging its dimensions, and we can see the reason. In Tragedy we cannot imitate several lines of actions carried on at one and the same time; we must confine ourselves to the action on the stage and the part taken by the players. But in Epic poetry, owing to the narrative form, many events simultaneously transacted can be presented; and these, if relevant to the subject, add mass and dignity to the poem. The Epic has here an advantage, and one that conduces to grandeur of effect, to diverting the mind of the hearer, and relieving the story with varying episodes. For sameness of incident soon produces satiety, and makes tragedies fail on the stage.

As for the metre, the heroic measure has proved its fitness by the test of experience. If a narrative poem in any other metre or in many metres were now composed, it would be found incongruous. For of all measures the heroic is the stateliest and the most massive; and hence it most readily admits rare words and metaphors, which is another point in which the narrative form of imitation stands alone. On the other hand, the iambic and the trochaic tetrameter are stirring measures, the latter being akin to dancing, the former expressive of action. Still more absurd would it be to mix together different metres, as was done by Chaeremon. Hence no one has ever composed a poem on a great scale in any other than heroic verse. Nature herself, as we have said, teaches the choice of the proper measure.

Homer, admirable in all respects, has the special merit of being the only poet who rightly appreciates the part he should take himself. The poet should speak as little as possible in his own person, for it is not this that makes him an imitator. Other poets appear themselves upon the scene throughout, and imitate but little and rarely. Homer, after a few prefatory words, at once brings in a man, or woman, or other personage; none of them wanting in characteristic qualities, but each with a character of his own.

The element of the wonderful is admitted in Tragedy. 8 The irrational, on which the wonderful depends for its chief effects, has wider scope in Epic poetry, because there the person acting is not seen. Thus, the pursuit of Hector would be ludicrous if placed upon the stage—the Greeks standing still and not joining in the pursuit, and Achilles waving them back. But in the Epic poem the absurdity passes unnoticed. Now the wonderful is pleasing: as may be inferred from the fact that, in telling a story, every one adds something startling of his own, knowing that his hearers like it. It is Homer who 9 has chiefly taught other poets the art of telling lies skilfully. The secret of it lies in a fallacy. For, assuming that if one thing is or becomes, a second is or becomes, men imagine that, if the second is, the first likewise is or becomes. But this is a false inference. Hence, where the first thing is untrue, it is quite unnecessary, provided the second be true, to add that the first is or has become. For the mind, knowing the second to be true, falsely infers the truth of the first. There is an example of this in the Bath Scene of the Odyssey.

Accordingly, the poet should prefer probable im- 10 possibilities to improbable possibilities. The tragic plot must not be composed of irrational parts. Everything irrational should, if possible, be excluded; or, at all events, it should lie outside the action of the play (as, in the Oedipus, the hero's ignorance as to the manner of Laius' death); not within the drama,—as in the Electra, the messenger's account of the Pythian games; or, as in the Mysians, the man who comes from Tegea to Mysia without speaking. The plea that otherwise the plot would have been ruined, is ridiculous; such a plot should not in the first instance be constructed. But once the irrational has been introduced and an air of likelihood imparted to it, we must accept it in spite of the absurdity. Take even the irrational incidents in the Odyssey, where Odysseus is left upon the shore of Ithaca. How intolerable even these might have been would be apparent if an inferior poet were to treat the subject.

1460 b As it is, the absurdity is veiled by the poetic charm with which the poet invests it.

The diction should be elaborated in the pauses of 11 the action, where there is no expression of character or thought. For, conversely, character and thought are merely obscured by a diction that is over brilliant.

XXV With respect to critical difficulties and their solutions, the number and nature of the sources from which they may be drawn may be thus exhibited.

The poet being an imitator, like a painter or any other artist, must of necessity imitate one of three objects,—things as they were or are, things as they are said or thought to be, or things as they ought to be. The vehicle of expression is language,—either current 2 terms or, it may be, rare words or metaphors. There are also many modifications of language, which we concede to the poets. Add to this, that the standard of 3 correctness is not the same in poetry and politics, any more than in poetry and any other art. Within the art of poetry itself there are two kinds of faults,—those which touch its essence, and those which are accidental. If a poet has chosen to imitate something, <but has 4 imitated it incorrectly> through want of capacity, the error is inherent in the poetry. But if the failure is due to a wrong choice—if he has represented a horse as throwing out both his off legs at once, or introduced technical inaccuracies in medicine, for example, or in any other art—the error is not essential to the poetry. These are the points of view from which we should consider and answer the objections raised by the critics.

First as to matters which concern the poet's own 5 art. If he describes the impossible, he is guilty of an error; but the error may be justified, if the end of the art be thereby attained (the end being that already mentioned),—if, that is, the effect of this or any other part of the poem is thus rendered more striking. A case in point is the pursuit of Hector. If, however, the end might have been as well, or better, attained without violating the special rules of the poetic art, the error is not justified: for every kind of error should, if possible, be avoided.

Again, does the error touch the essentials of the poetic art, or some accident of it? For example,—not to know that a hind has no horns is a less serious matter than to paint it inartistically.

Further, if it be objected that the description is not 6 true to fact, the poet may perhaps reply,—‘But the objects are as they ought to be’: just as Sophocles said that he drew men as they ought to be; Euripides, as they are. In this way the objection may be met. If, however, the representation be of neither kind, the poet may answer,—‘This is how men say the thing is.’ This applies to tales about the gods. It may well be that these stories are not higher than fact nor yet true to fact: they are, very possibly, what Xenophanes says of them. But anyhow, ‘this is what is said.’ Again, a description may be no better than the fact: ‘still, it was the fact’; as in the passage about the arms: ‘Upright upon their butt-ends stood the spears.’ This was the custom then, as it now is among the Illyrians.

Again, in examining whether what has been said or done by some one is poetically right or not, we must not look merely to the particular act or saying, and ask whether it is poetically good or bad. We must also consider by whom it is said or done, to whom, when, in whose interest, or for what end; whether, for instance, it be to secure a greater good, or avert a greater evil.

Other difficulties may be resolved by due regard to the usage of language. We may note a rare word, as in οὐρῆας μὲν πρῶτον, where the poet perhaps employs οὐρῆας not in the sense of mules, but of sentinels. So, again, of Dolon: ‘ill-favoured indeed he was to look upon.’ It is not meant that his body was ill-shaped, but that his face was ugly; for the Cretans use the word εὐειδής, ‘well-favoured,’ to denote a fair face. Again, ζωρότερον δὲ κέρασε, ‘mix the drink livelier,’ does not mean ‘mix it stronger’ as for hard drinkers, but ‘mix it quicker.’

Sometimes an expression is metaphorical, as 'Now all 10 gods and men were sleeping through the night,'—while at the same time the poet says: 'Often indeed as he turned his gaze to the Trojan plain, he marvelled at the sound of flutes and pipes.' 'All' is here used metaphorically for 'many,' all being a species of many. So in the verse,—'alone she hath no part . . .', οἴη, 'alone,' is metaphorical; for the best known may be called the only one.

Again, the solution may depend upon accent or 11 breathing. Thus Hippias of Thasos solved the difficulties in the lines,—δίδομεν (διδόμεν) δέ οἱ, and τὸ μὲν οὖ (οὐ) καταπύθεται ὄμβρῳ.

Or again, the question may be solved by punctuation, 12 as in Empedocles,—'Of a sudden things became mortal that before had learnt to be immortal, and things unmixed before mixed.'

Or again, by ambiguity of construction,—as in 13 παρώχηκεν δὲ πλέω νύξ, where the word πλέω is ambiguous.

Or by the usage of language. Thus any mixed 14 drink is called οἶνος, 'wine.' Hence Ganymede is said 'to pour the wine to Zeus,' though the gods do not drink wine. So too workers in iron are called χαλκείας, or workers in bronze. This, however, may also be taken as a metaphor.

Again, when a word seems to involve some inconsistency of meaning, we should consider how many senses it may bear in the particular passage. For example: 'there was stayed the spear of bronze'—we should ask in how many ways we may take 'being checked there.' The true mode of interpretation is the precise opposite of what Glaucon mentions. Critics, he says, jump at certain groundless conclusions; they pass adverse judgment and then proceed to reason on it; and, assuming that the poet has said whatever they happen to think, find fault if a thing is inconsistent with their own fancy. The question about Icarus has been treated in this fashion. The critics imagine he was a Lacedaemonian. They think it strange, therefore, that Telemachus should not have met him when he went to Lacedaemon. But the Cephallenian story may perhaps be the true one. They allege that Odysseus took a wife from among themselves, and that her father was Icarius not Icarus. It is merely a mistake, then, that gives plausibility to the objection.

In general, the impossible must be justified by reference* to artistic requirements, or to the higher reality, or to received opinion. With respect to the requirements of art, a probable impossibility is to be preferred to a thing improbable and yet possible. Again, it may be impossible that there should be men such as Zeuxis painted. 'Yes,' we say, 'but the impossible is the higher thing; for the ideal type must surpass the reality.' To justify the irrational, we appeal to what is commonly said to be. In addition to which, we urge that the irrational sometimes does not violate reason; just as 'it is probable that a thing may happen contrary to probability.'

Things that sound contradictory should be examined 18 by the same rules as in dialectical refutation—whether the same thing is meant, in the same relation, and in the same sense. We should therefore solve the question by reference to what the poet says himself, or to what is tacitly assumed by a person of intelligence.

The element of the irrational, and, similarly, depravity 19 of character, are justly censured when there is no inner necessity for introducing them. Such is the irrational element in the Aegæus of Euripides, and the badness of Menelaus in the Orestes.

Thus, there are five sources from which critical 20 objections are drawn. Things are censured either as impossible, or irrational, or morally hurtful, or contradictory, or contrary to artistic correctness. The answers should be sought under the twelve heads above mentioned.

XXVI The question may be raised whether the Epic or Tragic mode of imitation is the higher. If the more refined art is the higher, and the more refined in every case is that which appeals to the better sort of audience, the art which imitates anything and everything is manifestly most unrefined. The audience is supposed to be too dull to comprehend unless something of their own is thrown in by the performers, who therefore indulge in restless movements. Bad flute-players twist and twirl, if they have to represent 'the quoit-throw,' or hustle the coryphaeus when they perform the 'Scylla.' Tragedy, <sup>2</sup> it is said, has this same defect. We may compare the opinion that the older actors entertained of their successors. Mynniscus used to call Callippides 'ape' on account of the extravagance of his action, and the same <sup>1462 a</sup> view was held of Pindarus. Tragic art, then, as a whole, stands to Epic in the same relation as the younger to the elder actors. So we are told that Epic poetry is addressed to a cultivated audience, who do not need gesture; Tragedy, to an inferior public. Being then <sup>3</sup> unrefined, it is evidently the lower of the two.

Now, in the first place, this censure attaches not to the poetic but to the histrionic art; for gesticulation may be equally overdone in epic recitation, as by Sositratius, or in lyrical competition, as by Mnasiheus the Opuntian. Next, all action is not to be condemned—any more than all dancing—but only that of bad performers. Such was the fault found in Callippides, as also in others of our own day, who are censured for representing degraded women. Again, Tragedy like Epic poetry produces its effect even without action; it reveals its power by mere reading. If, then, in all other respects it is superior, this fault, we say, is not inherent in it.

And superior it is, because it has all the epic <sup>4</sup> elements—it may even use the epic metre—with the music and scenic effects as important accessories; and these produce the most vivid of pleasures. Further, it has vividness of impression in reading as well as in representation. Moreover, the art attains its end within 5 1462 b narrower limits; for the concentrated effect is more pleasurable than one which is spread over a long time and so diluted. What, for example, would be the effect of the Oedipus of Sophocles, if it were cast into a form as long as the Iliad? Once more, the Epic imitation 6 has less unity; as is shown by this, that any Epic poem will furnish subjects for several tragedies. Thus if the story adopted by the poet has a strict unity, it must either be concisely told and appear truncated; or, if it conform to the Epic canon of length, it must seem weak and watery. <Such length implies some loss of unity,> if, I mean, the poem is constructed out of several actions, like the Iliad and the Odyssey, which have many such parts, each with a certain magnitude of its own. Yet these poems are as perfect as possible in structure; each is, in the highest degree attainable, an imitation of a single action.

If, then, Tragedy is superior to Epic poetry in all these 7 respects, and, moreover, fulfils its specific function better as an art—for each art ought to produce, not any chance pleasure, but the pleasure proper to it, as already stated—it plainly follows that Tragedy is the higher art, as attaining its end more perfectly.

Thus much may suffice concerning Tragic and Epic 8 poetry in general; their several kinds and parts, with the number of each and their differences; the causes that make a poem good or bad; the objections of the critics and the answers to these objections. * * *

ART AND NATURE

ARISTOTLE, it must be premised at the outset, has not dealt with fine art in any separate treatise, he has formulated no theory of it, he has not marked the organic relation of the arts to one another. While his love of logical distinctions, his tendency to rigid demarcation, is shown even in the province of literary criticism by the care with which in the Poetics he maps out the subordinate divisions of his subject (the different modes of recognition the elements of the plot, etc.), yet he nowhere classifies the various kinds of poetry; still less has he given a scientific grouping of the fine arts and exhibited their specific differences. We may confidently assert that many of the aesthetic problems which have been since raised never even occurred to his mind, though precise answers to almost all such questions have been extracted from his writings by the unwise zeal of his admirers. He has however left some leading principles which we shall endeavour to follow out.

There is a special risk at the present day attending any such attempt to bring together his fragmentary remarks and present them in a connected form. His philosophy has in it the germs of so much modern thought that we may, almost without knowing it, find ourselves putting into his mouth not his own language but that of Hegel. Nor is it possible to determine by general rules how far the thought that is implicit in a philosophical system, but which the author himself has not drawn out, is to be reckoned as an integral part of the system. In any case, however, Aristotle's Poetics cannot be read apart from his other writings. No author is more liable to be misunderstood if studied piecemeal. The careless profusion with which he throws out the suggestions of the moment, leaving it to the intelligence or the previous knowledge of his readers to adjust his remarks and limit their scope, is in itself a possible source of misapprehension. It was an observation of Goethe that it needs some insight into Aristotle's general philosophy to understand what he says about the drama; that otherwise he confuses our studies; and that modern treatises on poetry have gone astray by seizing some accidental side of his doctrine. If it is necessary, then, to interpret Aristotle by himself, it will not be unfair in dealing with so coherent a thinker to credit him with seeing the obvious conclusions which flow from his principles, even when he has not formally stated them. To bring out the lines of attachment which subsist between the correlated parts of his system is a very different thing from discovering in him ideas which, even if present in the germ, could only have ripened in another soil and under other skies.

The distinction between fine and useful art was first brought out fully by Aristotle. In the history of Greek art we are struck rather by the union between the two forms of art than by their independence. It was a loss for art when the spheres of use and beauty came in practice to be dissevered, when the useful object ceased to be decorative, and the things of common life no longer gave delight to the maker and to the user. But the theoretic distinction between fine and useful art needed to be laid down, and to Aristotle we owe the first clear conception of fine art as a free and independent activity of the mind, outside the domain both of religion and of politics, having an end distinct from that of education or moral improvement. He has not indeed left us any continuous discussion upon fine art. The Poetics furnishes no complete theory even of poetry, nor is it probable that this is altogether due to the imperfect form in which this treatise has come down to us. But Aristotle is a systematic thinker, and numberless illustrations and analogies drawn from one or other of the arts, and scattered through his writings, show that he had given special attention to the significance of art in its widest sense; and that as he had formed a coherent idea of the place which art held in relation to nature, science, and morality, so too he had in his own mind thought out the relation in which the two branches of art stood to one another.

‘Art imitates nature’ (ἡ τέχνη μιμείται τὴν φύσιν), says Aristotle, and the phrase has been repeated and has passed current as a summary of the Aristotelian doctrine of fine art. Yet the original saying was never intended to differentiate between fine and useful art; nor indeed could it possibly bear the sense that fine art is a copy or reproduction of natural objects. The use of the term ‘nature’ would in itself put the matter beyond dispute; for nature in Aristotle is not the outward world of created things; it is the creative force, the productive principle of the universe. The context in each case where the phrase occurs determines its precise application. In the Physics<sup>1</sup> the point of the comparison is that alike in art and in nature there is the union of matter (ὕλη) with constitutive form (εἶδος), and that the knowledge of both elements is requisite for the natural philosopher as for the physician and the architect. In the Meteorologica<sup>1</sup> the reference is to cooking as an artificial mode of producing results similar to those produced by the spontaneous action of heat in the physical world; digestion (πέψις) itself (according to the medical theory of the day) being given as an instance of a process of cooking (ἐψησις) carried on by nature within the body. In the instances above quoted 'art' is limited by the context to useful art; but the analogy does not rest there. Art in its widest acceptation has, like nature, certain ends in view, and in the adaptation of means to ends catches hints from nature who is already in some sort an unconscious artist.

While art in general imitates the method of nature, the phrase has special reference to useful art, which learns from nature the precise end at which to aim. In the selection of the end she acts with infallible instinct, and her endeavour to attain it is on the whole successful. But at times she makes mistakes as indeed do the schoolmaster and the physician ;<sup>1</sup> failures rather than mistakes they should be called, for the fault is not hers ; her rational intention is liable to be frustrated by inherent flaws in the substances with which she is compelled to work. She is subject to limitations, and can only make the best of her material.<sup>2</sup>

The higher we ascend in the scale of being, the more does nature need assistance in carrying out her designs. Man, who is her highest creation, she brings into the world more helpless than any other animal,—unshod, unclad, unarmed.<sup>3</sup> But in his seeming imperfection lies man's superiority, for the fewer the finished appliances with which he is provided, the greater is his need for intellectual effort. By means of the rational faculty of art, with which nature has endowed him richly, he is able to come to her aid, and in ministering to his own necessities to fulfil her uncompleted purposes. Where from any cause nature fails, art steps in. Nature aims at producing health ; in her restorative processes we observe an instinctive capacity for self-curing.<sup>4</sup> But she does not always succeed, and the art of the physician makes good the defect.

He discovers one of the links of the chain which terminates in health, and uses nature's own machinery to start a series of movements which lead to the desired result.<sup>1</sup> Again, nature has formed man to be a 'political animal.'<sup>2</sup> Family and tribal life are stages on the way to a more complete existence, and the term of the process is reached when man enters into that higher order of community called the state. The state is indeed a natural institution, but needs the political art to organise it and to realise nature's full idea. The function, then, of the useful arts is in all cases 'to supply the deficiencies of nature';<sup>3</sup> and he who would be a master in any art must first discern

In Phys. ii. 8. 199 a 15, ἡ τέχνη τὸ μὲν ἐπιτελεῖ ἃ ἡ φύσις ἀδυνατεῖ ἀπεργάσασθαι, τὰ δὲ μιμεῖται it is probable that the distinction is not, as would at first sight seem, between useful and fine art, but between two aspects of useful art. The sentence is not quite logical in form, but the meaning is that useful art on the one hand satisfies those needs of man for which nature has not fully provided, on the other hand its processes are those of nature (μιμεῖται sc. τὴν φύσιν). The two clauses respectively mark the end and the method of useful art. The main argument of the chapter is in favour of this view.

the true end by a study of nature's principles, and then employ the method which she suggests for the attainment of that end.

'Nature taught Art,' says Milton; and the same Aristotelian idea was in the mind of Dante, when he makes Virgil condemn usury as a departure from nature: 'Philosophy, to him who hears it, points out not in one place alone, how Nature takes her course from the Divine Intellect, and from its art. And, if thou note well thy Physics,<sup>1</sup> thou wilt find, not many pages from the first, that your art as far as it can, follows her (Nature), as the scholar does his master. . . . And because the usurer takes another way, he contemns Nature in herself, and in her follower (Art), placing elsewhere his hope.'<sup>2</sup> The phrase on which we have been commenting is the key to this passage: useful art supplements nature, and at the same time follows her guidance.

‘IMITATION’ AS AN AESTHETIC TERM

THE term ‘fine art’ is not one that has been transmitted to us from the Greeks. Their phrase was the ‘imitative arts’ (μιμητικαὶ τέχναι), ‘modes of imitation’ (μιμήσεις),<sup>1</sup> or sometimes the ‘liberal arts’ (ἐλευθέριοι τέχναι). ‘Imitation’ as the common characteristic of the fine arts, including poetry, was not originated by Aristotle. In literature the phrase in this application first occurs in Plato, though, not improbably, it may have been already current in popular speech as marking the antithesis between fine art and industrial production. The idea of imitation is connected in our minds with a want of creative freedom, with a literal or servile copying: and the word, as transmitted from Plato to Aristotle, was already tinged by some such disparaging associations. The Platonic view that the real world is a weak or imperfect repetition of an ideal archetype led to the world of reality being regarded in a special sense, and on a still lower plane, as a world of mere imitation. Aristotle, as his manner was, accepted the current phrase and interpreted it anew. True, he may sometimes have been misled by its guidance, and not unfrequently his meaning is obscured by his adherence to the outworn formula. But he deepened and enriched its signification, looking at it from many sides in the light of the masterpieces of Greek art and literature.

This will become apparent as we proceed. Meanwhile—if we may so far anticipate what is to follow—a crucial instance of the inadequacy of the literal English equivalent ‘imitation’ to express the Aristotelian idea is afforded by a passage in ch. xxv. The artist may ‘imitate things as they ought to be’:<sup>1</sup> he may place before him an unrealised ideal. We see at once that there is no question here of bare imitation, of a literal transcript of the world of reality.

It has been already mentioned that ‘to imitate nature,’ in the popular acceptance of the phrase, is not for Aristotle the function of fine art. The actual objects of aesthetic imitation are threefold

—ἥθη, πάθη, πράξεις.<sup>1</sup> By ἥθη are meant the characteristic moral qualities, the permanent dispositions of the mind, which reveal a certain condition of the will: πάθη are the more transient emotions, the passing moods of feeling: πράξεις are actions in their proper and inward sense. An act viewed merely as an external process or result, one of a series of outward phenomena, is not the true object of aesthetic imitation. The πρᾶξις that art seeks to reproduce is mainly an inward process, a psychical energy working outwards; deeds, incidents, events, situations, being included under it so far as these spring from an inward act of will, or elicit some activity of thought or feeling.<sup>2</sup>

Here lies the explanation of the somewhat startling phrase used in the Poetics, ch. ii., that 'men in action' are the objects imitated by the fine arts:<sup>3</sup>—by all and not merely by dramatic or narrative poetry where action is more obviously represented. Everything that expresses the mental life, that reveals a rational personality, will fall within this larger sense of 'action.' Such actions are not necessarily processes extending over a period of time: they may realise themselves in a single moment; they may be summed up in a particular mood, a given situation. The phrase is virtually an equivalent for the ἡθῆ, πάθη, πράξεις above enumerated.

The common original, then, from which all the arts draw is human life,—its mental processes, its spiritual movements, its outward acts issuing from deeper sources; in a word, all that constitutes the inward and essential activity of the soul. On this principle landscape and animals are not ranked among the objects of æsthetic imitation. The whole universe is not conceived of as the raw material of art. Aristotle's theory is in agreement with the practice of the Greek poets and artists of the classical period, who introduce the external world only so far as it forms a background of action, and enters as an emotional element into man's life and heightens the human interest.

We may now proceed to determine more nearly the meaning of 'imitation.'

A work of art is a likeness (ὁμοίωμα) or reproduction of an original, and not a symbolic representation of it;<sup>1</sup> and this holds good whether the artist draws from a model in the real world or from an unrealised ideal in the mind. The distinction may be shown by Aristotle's own illustrations. A sign or symbol has no essential resemblance, no natural connexion, with the thing signified. Thus spoken words are symbols of mental states, written words are symbols of spoken words; the connexion between them is conventional.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand mental impressions are not signs or symbols, but copies of external reality, likenesses of the things themselves. In the act of sensuous perception objects stamp upon the mind an impress of themselves like that of a signet ring, and the picture (φάντασμα) so engraven on the memory is compared to a portrait (ζωγράφημα, εἰκόν).<sup>2</sup> Thus the creations of art are, as it were, pictures which exist for the 'phantasy.'

Of this faculty, however, Aristotle does not give a very clear or consistent account. He defines it as "the movement which results upon an actual sensation": more simply we may define it as the after-effect of a sensation, the continued presence of an impression after the object which first excited it has been withdrawn from actual experience.<sup>3</sup> As such it is brought in to explain the illusions of dreaming and other kindred phenomena. But it is more than a receptivity of sense,<sup>1</sup> it is on the border-line between sense and thought. It is treated as an image-forming faculty, by which we can recall at will pictures previously presented to the mind<sup>2</sup> and may even accomplish some of the processes of thought.<sup>3</sup> It represents subjectively all the particular concrete objects perceived by the external senses. From these 'phantasms' or representations of the imagination the intellect abstracts its ideas or universal concepts. Without the imagination the intellect cannot work through lack of matter. The idea, therefore, which is purely intellectual, implies and contains in itself whatever is universal, that is intelligible; in the object of sense. When in default of a nearer equivalent we use the term 'imagination'—that is, an image-making power—we must remember that Aristotle's psychology does not admit of such a faculty as a creative imagination, which not merely reproduces objects passively perceived, but fuses together the things of thought and sense, and forms a new world of its own, recombining and transmuting* the materials of experience.<sup>1</sup> This work is for Aristotle the result of the spontaneous and necessary union of intellect and sense.

<sup>2</sup> De Mem. et Remin. 1. 450 a 27—451 a 17. Cf. de Interpret. i. 1. 16 a 7, where the παθήματα or mental impressions are said to be ὁμιώματα of reality.

We have thus advanced another step in the argument. A work of art reproduces its original, not as it is in itself, but as it appears to the senses. Art addresses itself not to the abstract reason but to the sensibility and image-making faculty; it is concerned with outward appearances; it employs illusions; its world is not that which is revealed by pure thought; it sees truth, but in its concrete manifestations, not as an abstract idea.

Important consequences follow from the doctrine of aesthetic semblance, first noted by Plato<sup>2</sup>—though in depreciation of fine art—and firmly apprehended by Aristotle. Art does not attempt to embody the objective reality of things, but only their sensible appearances. Indeed by the very principles of Aristotle's philosophy it can present no more than a semblance; for it impresses the artistic form upon a matter which is not proper to that form. Thus it severs itself from material reality and the corresponding wants. Herein lies the secret of its emancipating power. The real emotions, the positive needs of life, have always in them some element of disquiet. By the union of a form with a matter which in the world of experience is alien to it, a magical effect is wrought. The pressure of everyday reality is removed, and the aesthetic emotion is released as an independent activity. Art, then, moving in a world of images and appearances, and creating after a pattern existing in the mind, must be skilled in the use of illusion. By this alone can it give coherence to its creations and impart to its fictions an air of reality. The doctrine of aesthetic semblance and of τὸ πιθανόν, which depends on it, is carried so far that the poet working by illusions 'ought to prefer probable impossibilities to possible improbabilities.'<sup>1</sup>

<sup>2</sup> In Rep. x. 598 B painting, like other imitative arts, is a μίμησις φαντάσματος. In Sophist 264 C—267 A, these arts fall under the head of φανταστική. For the importance of this contribution to aesthetic theory see Bosanquet, History of Aesthetic, pp. 28–30.

While all works of art are likenesses of an original and have reference to a world independently known, the various arts reflect the image from without by different means and with more or less directness and vividness.

Music was held by Aristotle, as by the Greeks

generally, to be the most 'imitative' or representative of the arts. It is a direct image, a copy of character. We generally think of it in a different way. The emotion it suggests, the message it conveys, corresponds but little with a reality outside itself, with a world of feeling already known. We cannot test its truth by its accordance with any original. It is capable of expressing general and elementary moods of feeling, which will be variously interpreted by different hearers. It cannot render the finer shades of extra-musical emotion with any degree of certainty and precision. Its expressive power, its capacity to reproduce independent realities, is weak in proportion as the impression it produces is vivid and definite. But to Aristotle, who here accepts the traditions of his country, the very opposite seems true. Music is the express image and reflexion of moral character. 'In rhythms and melodies we have the most realistic imitations of anger and mildness as well as of courage, temperance and all their opposites.'<sup>1</sup> Not only states of feeling but also strictly ethical qualities and dispositions of mind are reproduced by musical imitation, and on the close correspondence between the copy and the original depends the importance of music in the formation of character. Music in reflecting character moulds and influences it.

A partial explanation of the prevalence of such a view is to be found in the dependent position which music occupied among the Greeks. It was one of the accessories of poetry, to which it was strictly subordinate, and consisted of comparatively simple strains. Much of its meaning was derived from the associations it called up, and from the emotional atmosphere which surrounded it. It was associated with definite occasions and solemnities, it was accompanied by certain dances and attached to well-known words. 'When there are no words,' says Plato, 'it is very difficult to recognise the meaning of harmony or rhythm, or to see that any worthy object is imitated by them.'<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Laws ii. 669 E. On the whole subject of Greek music see The Modes of Ancient Greek Music by D. B. Monro (Oxford 1894). Mr. Monro after insisting on the close connexion between words and melodies thus proceeds: 'The beauty and even the persuasive effect of a voice depend, as we are more or less aware, in the first place upon the pitch or key in which it is set, and in the second place upon subtle variations of pitch, which give emphasis, or light and shade. Answering to the first of these elements, ancient music, if the main contention of this essay is right, has its system of Modes or keys. Answering to the second it has a series of scales in which the delicacy and variety of the intervals still fill us with wonder. In both these points modern music shows diminished resources. We have in the Keys the same or even a greater command of degrees of pitch; but we seem to have lost the close relation which once obtained between a note as the result

But even apart from interpretative words it would seem that the ethical significance of music was maintained by Aristotle and his school. In the Problems we find it said, 'Melody even apart from words has an ethical quality.'<sup>1</sup> Though we may not be able entirely to comprehend the Greek point of view as to the moral import of music, we must bear in mind that the dominant element in Greek music was the rhythm; the spirit and meaning of any given composition was felt to reside especi-of physical facts and the same note as an index of temper or emotion. A change of key affects us, generally speaking, like a change of colour or of movement—not as the heightening or soothing of a state of feeling. In respect of the second element of vocal expression, in the rise and fall of the pitch, Greek music possessed in the multiplicity of its scales a range of expression to which there is no modern parallel. The nearest analogue may be found in the use of modulation from a major to a minor key, or the reverse. But the changes of genus and "colour" at the disposal of an ancient musician must have been acoustically more striking, and must have come nearer to reproducing, in an idealised form, the tones and inflexions of the speaking voice. The tendency of music that is based upon harmony is to treat the voice as one of a number of instruments, and accordingly to curtail the use of it as the great source of dramatic and emotional effect. The consequence is two-fold. On the one hand we lose sight of the direct influence exerted by sound of certain degrees of pitch on the human sensibility, and thus ultimately on character. On the other hand, the music becomes an independent creation. It may still be a vehicle of the deepest feeling; but it no longer seeks the aid of language, or reaches its aim through the channels by which language influences the mind of man.'

ally here; and the doctrine which asserted the unique imitative capacity of music had for Aristotle its theoretic basis in this, that the external movements of rhythmical sound bear a close resemblance to the movements of the soul. Each single note is felt as an inward agitation. The regular succession of musical sounds, governed by the laws of melody and rhythm, are allied to those πράξεις or outward activities which are the expression of a mental state.<sup>1</sup>

This power which belongs in an eminent degree to the sense of hearing is but feebly exhibited by the other senses. Taste and touch do not directly reflect moral qualities; sight, but little, for form and colour are 'rather signs of moral qualities' than actual imitations of them.<sup>1</sup> This passage of the Politics would seem to imply that painting and sculpture directly render little more than the outward and physical features of an object, and that they convey moral and spiritual facts almost wholly by signs or symbols. Here, it might be thought, we are introduced to a type of art foreign to the mind of Greece, an art in which the inner qualities are shadowed forth in outward forms, with which they are conventionally associated, but which suggest no obvious and immediate resemblance.

The classification of melodies into ἡθικά, ἐνθουσιαστικά, πρακτικά (Pol. v. (viii.) 7. 1341 b 33), corresponds, it may be observed, with the three objects of imitative art ἡθῆ, πάθος, πράξεις.

But the phrase here used, like many of Aristotle's obiter dicta, must be taken with considerable latitude and in conjunction with other passages. Some emphasis, too, must be laid on the admission that form and colour do, in however slight a degree, reflect the moral character, and on the qualifying 'rather' prefixed to the statement that they are 'signs of moral qualities.' They are indeed less perfect manifestations of these qualities than music, whose rhythmical and ordered movements have a special affinity with the nature of the soul, and reproduce with most directness the moral life, which is itself an activity, a movement.<sup>1</sup> Still facial expression, gestures, attitudes, are a dialect which nature herself has taught, and which needs no skilled interpreter to expound. They are in the truest sense a natural, not an artificial medium of expression, and convey their meaning by the force of immediate suggestion and without a conscious process of inference. If symbols they may be called, they are not conventional symbols, but living signs through which the outward frame follows and reflects the movements of the spirit; they are a visible token of the inner unity of body and soul.

The two passages just quoted from the Problems go farther and declare that sound alone carries with it any immediate suggestion of moral qualities; sight, taste, and smell are expressly excluded. This is perhaps an exaggeration of the proper Aristotelian view.

The reading of character by gesture and facial expression, as explained by the Aristotelian school, rests on an assumed harmony, not in the case of hearing only but of other organs of sense also, between the movements within and those without.<sup>2</sup> The comparisons, moreover, elsewhere made between Hence, Aristotle proceeds, some have wrongly inferred that the soul itself is a harmony. Cf. Probl. xix. 38. 920 b 33, ῥυθμῷ δὲ χαίρομεν διὰ τὸ γινώριμον καὶ τεταγμένον ἀριθμὸν ἔχειν, καὶ κινεῖν ἡμᾶς τεταγμένως· οἰκειότερα γὰρ ἢ τεταγμένη κίνησις φύσει τῆς ἀτάκτου, ὥστε καὶ κατὰ φύσιν μᾶλλον. painting and poetry as expressive of character cease to be relevant if we suppose that form and colour have no natural, as distinct from a conventional, significance in rendering the phenomena of mind. Aristotle no doubt holds that sound is unequalled in its power of direct expression, but he does not deny that colour and form too have a similar capacity though in an inferior degree. The instinctive movements of the limbs, the changes of colour produced on the surface of the body, are something more than arbitrary symbols; they imply that the body is of itself responsive to the animating soul, which leaves its trace on the visible organism.

Painting and sculpture working through an inert material cannot indeed reproduce the life of the soul in all its variety and successive manifestations. In their frozen and arrested movement they fix eternally the feeling they portray. A single typical moment is seized and becomes representative of all that precedes or follows. Still shape and line and colour even here retain something of their significance, they are in their own degree a natural image of the mind; and their meaning is helped out by symmetry, which in the arts of repose answers to rhythm, the chief vehicle of expression in the arts of movement. Aristotle does not himself notice the analogy between dancing and sculpture, which is brought out by later writers, but he would have perfectly apprehended the feeling which suggested the saying, 'The statues of the classic artists are the relics of ancient dancing.'<sup>1</sup> The correspondence lies in the common element of rhythmic form. This, which was the soul of Greek music and Greek dancing, would not on Aristotle's general principles lose all its expressive power when transferred to the material of the plastic arts, modified though it may be in the transference.

Even dancing, we read in the Poetics, imitates character, emotion, action.<sup>2</sup> The expressive power of dancing, admitted by Aristotle and by all Greek tradition, receives its most instructive commentary in Lucian's pamphlet on the subject, which, when due allowance is made for exaggeration and the playful gravity so characteristic of the writer, is still inspired by an old Greek sentiment. Rhetoricians and musicians had already written treatises on the art, and Lucian in handling the same theme imitates their semi-philosophic manner. Dancing is placed in the front rank of the fine arts, and all the sciences are made contributory to it. The dancer must have a fine genius, a critical judgment of poetry, a ready and comprehensive memory; like Homer's Calchas he must know the past, the present, and the future. Above all he needs to have mastered all mythology from chaos and the origin of the universe down to Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, and to be able to reproduce the legends in their spirit and their details. He must avoid the 'terrible solecisms' of some ignorant performers. Like the orator he should aim at being always perspicuous; he must be understood though he is dumb and heard though he says nothing. Dancing is not inferior to tragedy itself in expressive capacity; it is descriptive of every shade of character and emotion. Moreover it harmonises the soul of the spectator, trains the moral sympathies, and acts as a curative and quieting influence on the passions.

Poetry unlike the other arts produces its effects (except such as depend on metre) through symbols alone. It cannot directly present form and colour to the eye; it can only imply words to call up images of the objects to be represented; nor need these words be audible; they may be merely written symbols. The sign too and the thing signified are not here so linked together by obvious suggestion that their meaning is at once and everywhere apprehended; they vary with race and country, they cannot claim to be a universal language. Yet poetry, though it makes use of symbols which have to be interpreted by the mind, is no exception to Aristotle's principle that fine art is not a body of symbols. The image it represents is not one which through artificial means or remote association reminds us of a reality already known. Though signs are the medium of expression, the representation is not purely symbolical; for the signs are those significant words which in life are the natural and familiar medium by which thought and feeling are revealed. The world which poetry creates is not explicitly stated by Aristotle to be a likeness or ὁμοίωμα of an original, but this is implied all through the Poetics. The original which it reflects is human action and character in all their diverse modes of manifestation; no other art has equal range of subject matter, or can present so complete and satisfying an image of its original. In the drama the poetic imitation of life attains its perfect form; but it is here also that the idea of imitation in its more rudimentary sense is at once apparent; speech has its counterpart in speech, and, if the play is put on the stage, action is rendered by action. Indeed the term imitation, as popularly applied to poetry, was probably suggested to the Greeks by those dramatic forms of poetry in which acting or recitation produced an impression allied to that of mimicry.

Poetry, music, and dancing constitute in Aristo tie a group by themselves, their common element being imitation by means of rhythm—rhythm which admits of being applied to words, sounds, and the movements of the body.<sup>1</sup> The history of these arts bears out the views we find expressed in Greek writers upon the theory of music; it is a witness to the primitive unity of music and poetry, and to the close alliance of the two with dancing. Together they form a natural triad, and illustrate a characteristic of the ancient world to retain as indivisible wholes branches of art or science which the separative spirit of modern thought has broken up into their elements. The intimate fusion of the three arts afterwards known as the 'musical' arts—or rather, we should perhaps say, the alliance of music and dancing under the supremacy of poetry—was exhibited even in the person of the artist. The office of the poet as teacher of the chorus demanded a practical knowledge of all that passed under the term 'dancing,' including steps, gestures, attitudes, and the varied resources of rhythmical movement. Aeschylus, we are told,<sup>2</sup> 'was the inventor of many orchestric attitudes,' and it is added that the ancient poets were called orchestric, not only because they trained their choruses, but also because they taught choral dances outside the theatre to such as wished to learn them. 'So wise and honourable a thing,' says Athenaeus,<sup>1</sup> 'was dancing that Pindar calls Apollo the dancer,' and he quotes the words: 'Ορχήστ', ἀγλαίας ἀνάσσων, εὐρυφάρετρ' Ἀπολλων.

Improvements in the technique of music or in the construction of instruments are associated with many names well known in the history of poetry. The poet, lyric or dramatic, composed the accompaniment as well as wrote the verses; and it was made a reproach against Euripides, who was the first to deviate from the established usage, that he sought the aid of Iophon, son of Sophocles, in the musical setting of his dramas. The very word ποιητής 'poet' in classical times often implies the twofold character of poet and musician, and in later writers is sometimes used, like our 'composer,' in a strictly limited reference to music.

Aristotle does full justice to the force of rhythmic form and movement in the arts of music and dancing. The instinctive love of melody and rhythm is, again, one of the two causes to which he traces the origin of poetry,<sup>2</sup> but he lays little stress on this element

<sup>2</sup> I take the two αἰτίαι φυσικαί (Poet. iv. 1) of poetry to be (1) the instinct of μίμησις, regarded as a primitive mode of learning (iv. 2-5), and (2) the instinct for ἁρμονία and ῥυθμός (iv. 6). The whole passage gains much by this interpretation. The objection to it is the abruptness with which the instinct for harmony and rhythm is introduced in § 6, so as to suggest a in estimating the finished products of the poetic art. In the Rhetoric<sup>1</sup> he observes that if a sentence has metre it will be poetry; but this is said in a popular way. It was doubtless the received opinion,<sup>2</sup> but it is one which he twice combats in the Poetics, insisting that it is not metrical form that makes a poem.<sup>3</sup> In one of these passages (ch.

doubt whether there is not after § 5 a lacuna in the text, in which harmony and rhythm were mentioned as the second cause. Mr. R. P. Hardie (in Mind, vol. iv. No. 15) would account for the abruptness of § 6 in another way: 'I would suggest that the transition to the second αἰτία is to be found in the preceding sentence, which is to the effect that when an object imitated has not been seen before, so that the pleasure of recognition cannot be present, there may still be pleasure, which "will be due, not to the imitation as such, but to the execution (ἀπεργασία), the colouring (χρoιά), or some such cause." Here plainly two kinds of pleasure which are necessarily independent are referred to, and there is no difficulty in supposing ἀπεργασία and χρoιά to be intended by Aristotle to correspond roughly in γραφικὴ to ἁρμονία and ῥυθμός in ποιητική.'

The ordinary interpretation makes the two αἰτίαι to be the instinct of imitation, and the pleasure derived from imitation. This interpretation is open to the objection that it gives us not two independent αἰτίαι but two tendencies, both of which are referred to the same αἰτία,—namely, the natural love of knowledge.

i. 7-9) he goes a step farther and presents what appears to have been at the time an original view. Poetry, he explains, is a form of artistic μίμησις, and its essence lies rather in the 'imitation' of the idea than in the mere versification. Within the field of literature he recalls actual examples of such artistic 'imitation,' even in prose writings, and notes the want of a common term which would embrace every imaginative delineation of life that employs language as its medium of expression. In illustration of his point he mentions different kinds of literary composition, which have not hitherto been brought under a single distinctive designation,—(1) the mimes of Sophron and Xenarchus and the dialogues of Plato, all of them prose compositions of a dramatic or semi-dramatic character: (2) verse composition, whether written in a single metre or in heterogeneous metres. The obvious suggestion of the passage is that the text as it stands is hardly sound), 'Αριστοτέλης δὲ ἐν τῇ περὶ ποιητῶν οὕτως γράφει "οὐκοῦν οὐδὲ ἑμμέτρους (†) τοὺς καλουμένους Σώφρονος μίμους μὴ φῶμεν εἶναι λόγους καὶ μιμήσεις ἢ τοὺς Ἀλεξαμένου τοῦ Τηίου τοὺς πρώτους (‡ πρότερον) γραφόντας τῶν Σωκρατικῶν διαλόγων;" 'Are we therefore to deny that the mimes of Sophron' (whose very name shows that they are imitative or mimetic), 'though in no way metrical,—or again the dialogues of Alexamenus of Teos, the first (†) Socratic dialogues that were written,—are prose and at the same time imitations (and hence, poetic compositions)!' On this passage see Bernays, Zwei Abhandlungen über die Aristotelische Theorie des Drama, p. 83. Cf. Diog. meaning of the word 'poet' should be widened so as to include any writer, either in prose or verse, whose work is an 'imitation' within the aesthetic meaning of the term.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The general sense of the passage (Post. i. 6-9) is clear, though the text offers difficulties in detail. In § 6 Ueberweg's deletion of ἐποποιία and Bernays' admirable conjecture ἀνώνυμος are both confirmed by the Arabic version and may be accepted without hesitation. Again in § 6 μόνον τοῖς λόγοις I understand to mean 'by language alone' (i.e. without music), ψιλοῖς 'without metre' (as e.g. Rhet. iii. 2. 1404 b 14 where ἐν δὲ τοῖς ψιλοῖς λόγοις is opposed to ἐπὶ τῶν μέτρων), ψιλός as usual implying the absence of some accompaniment or adjunct which is suggested by the context. The order of words τοῖς λόγοις ψιλοῖς instead of τοῖς ψιλοῖς λόγοις is due to the pause in the sense at μόνον τοῖς λόγοις, at which point ψιλοῖς comes in with a predicative force as if the whole phrase were to be ψιλοῖς ἢ ἐμμέτροις: τοῖς μέτροις, however, being substituted for ἐμμέτροις.

In § 9 ὁμοίως δὲ κἄνε ἢ τις κτλ. I accept the reading of the apographa καὶ τοῦτον (καὶ A<sup>c</sup>) ποιητὴν προσαγορευτέον: 'and the same principle will apply even if a person mixed all his metres (and could not, therefore, be called a—ποιός of a certain metre); we must bring him too under our general term poet;' i.e. by shifting the point of view, and fixing our mind on the μίμησις not on the metrical form, we bring in another writer whom strictly we should exclude, if we made the title to the name ποιητής to be the construction of a certain sort of metre.

As I read the whole passage there is a transition from the negative to the positive form of expression. In §§ 6 and 7 the form is negative. 'The art . . . is at present without a name. There is no common term we can apply to artistic "imitation" in prose, in metre of a single kind—' the proper continuation of which would have been, 'and in mixed metres.' But in the course of §§ 7-8 the positive idea has now emerged that it is μίμησις not verse-writing which makes the ποιητής and accordingly § 9 is cast in a new mould, as if the whole had run thus, 'we ought to give the comprehensive name of ποιητής to artistic imitators whether in

The general question whether metre is necessary for poetical expression has been raised by many modern critics and poets, and has sometimes been answered in the negative, as by Sidney, Shelley, Wordsworth.<sup>1</sup> It is, however, worth observing prose, or metre of a single kind, or mixed metres.' The parenthetic remark of § 8 διὸ τὸν μὲν ποιητὴν δίκαιον καλεῖν κτλ. may through its positive form have had some influence in determining the form of ὁμοίως δὲ . . . προσαγορευτέον.

If, on the other hand, we supply with Valien the words οὐδὲν ἂν ἔχοιμεν ὀνομάσαι κοινόν as the apodosis to ὁμοίως δὲ κἂν εἴ τις—ποιῶτο, the following clause, —καὶ ποιητὴν προσαγορευτέον 'and we must style him poet,'—tacked on to the suppressed apodosis is intolerably harsh. The correction καίτοι ποιητὴν προσαγορευτέον (Rassow, Zeller) obviates this objection and may be the true reading. But whether we read καὶ τοῦτον or καίτοι we are relieved from the necessity of assuming, with Susemihl, a dislocation in the general order of the clauses (see Crit. Notes) and of bracketing certain phrases.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Sir Philip Sidney, An Apologie for Poetrie: 'The greatest part of the poets have apparelled their poetical inventions in that numerous kind of writing which is called verse. Indeed but apparelled, verse being but an ornament and no cause to poetry, since there have been many most excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets. For Xenophon, who did imitate so excellently as to give us effigiem iusti imperii—the portraiture of a just empire under the name of Cyrus (as Cicero saith of him)—made therein an absolute heroical poem.'

And again: 'One may be a poet without versing, and a versifier without poetry.'

Cervantes, Don Quixote: 'An epic may also be as well written in prose as in verse.'

Shelley, A Defence of Poetry: 'Yet it is by no means essential that a poet should accommodate his language to this traditional form, so that the harmony, which is its spirit, be observed. The practice is indeed convenient and popular, and to be preferred, especially in that from Aristotle's point of view, which was mainly one of observation, the question to be determined was rather as to the vehicle or medium of literary μίμησις; and so far as the μίμησις doctrine is concerned, it is undeniable that some kinds of imaginative subject matter are better expressed in prose, some in verse, and that Aristotle, who had before him experimental examples of writings poetic in spirit, but not metrical in form, had sufficient grounds for advocating an extension of meaning for the term ποιητής. But as regards the Art of Poetry, his reasoning does not lead us to conclude that he would have reckoned the authors of prose dialogues or romances among poets strictly so called. As Mr. Courthope truly says,<sup>1</sup> such composition as includes much action: but every great poet must inevitably innovate upon the example of his predecessors in the exact structure of his peculiar versification. The distinction between poets and prose-writers is a vulgar error. . . . Plato was essentially a poet—the truth and splendour of his imagery, and the melody of his language are the most intense that it is possible to conceive. . . . Lord Bacon was a poet. His language has a sweet and majestic rhythm, which satisfies the sense, no less than the almost superhuman wisdom of his philosophy satisfies the intellect.'

Wordsworth in his Preface also enforces the doctrine that metre is not essential to poetry.

On the discussion in the Renaissance as to whether poetry could be written in prose see Spingarn, Literary Criticism in the Renaissance (New York 1899), pp. 35 ff. The expression 'poetic prose' appears, he observes, perhaps for the first time in Minturno L'Arte Poetica (1564).

'he does not attempt to prove that metre is not a necessary accompaniment of the higher conceptions of poetry,' and he, 'therefore, cannot be ranged with those who support that extreme opinion.'

Still there would appear to be some want of firmness in the position he takes up as to the place and importance of metre. In his definition of tragedy (ch. vi. 2) 'embellished language' (ἡδυσμένος λόγος) is included among the constituent elements of tragedy; and the phrase is then explained to mean language that has the twofold charm of metre (which is a branch of rhythm) and of melody. But these elements are placed in a subordinate rank and are hardly treated as essentials. They are in this respect not unlike scenery or spectacular effect (ὄψις), which, though deduced by Aristotle from the definition, is not explicitly mentioned in it. The essence of the poetry is the 'imitation'; the melody and the verse are the 'seasoning'<sup>1</sup> of the language. They hold a place, as Teichmüller observes,<sup>2</sup> similar to that which

Aristotle, highly as he rates the aesthetic capacity of the sense of hearing in his treatment of music, says nothing to show that he values at its proper worth the power of rhythmical sound as a factor in poetry; and this is the more striking in a Greek, whose enjoyment of poetry came through the ear rather than the eye, and for whom poetry was so largely associated with music. After all, there can hardly be a greater difference between two ways of saying the same thing than that one is said in verse, the other in prose. There are some lyrics which have lived and will always live by their musical charm, and by a strange magic that lies in the setting of the words. We need not agree with a certain modern school who would empty all poetry of poetical thought and etherealise it till it melts into a strain of music; who sing to us we hardly know of what, but in such a way that the echoes of the real world, its men and women, its actual stir and conflict, are faint and hardly to be discerned. The poetry, we are told, resides not in the ideas conveyed, not in the blending of soul and sense, but in the sound itself, in the cadence of the verse.

Yet, false as this view may be, it is not perhaps more false than that other which wholly ignores the effect of musical sound and looks only to the thought that is conveyed. Aristotle comes perilously near this doctrine, and was saved from it, we may conjecture—if indeed he was saved—only by an instinctive reluctance to set at naught the traditional sentiment of Greece.

His omission of architecture from the list of the fine arts may also cause surprise to modern readers; for here, as in sculpture, the artistic greatness of Greece stands undisputed. In this, however, he is merely following the usage of his countrymen who reckoned architecture among the useful arts. It was linked to the practical world. It sprang out of the needs of civic and religious life, and the greatest triumphs of the art were connected with public faith and worship. To a Greek the temple, which was the culmination of architectural skill, was the house of the god, the abode of his image, a visible pledge of his protecting presence. At the same time,—and this was the decisive point—architecture had not the ‘imitative’ quality which was regarded as essential to fine art. Modern writers may tell us that its forms owe their origin to the direct suggestions of the physical world—of natural caverns or forest arches—and in the groined roof they may trace a marked resemblance to an avenue of interlacing trees. Such resemblances, however, are much fainter in Greek than in Gothic architecture; apart from which the argument from origin would here be as much out of place, as it would be to maintain, in relation to music, that the reason why people now enjoy Beethoven is, that their earliest ancestors of arboreal habits found musical notes to be a telling adjunct to love-making.

Be the origin of architecture what it may, it is certain that the Greeks did not find its primitive type and model in the outward universe. 'A building as an organic whole did not call up any image of a world outside itself, though the method of architecture does remind Aristotle of the structural method of nature. Even if architecture had seemed to him to reproduce the appearances of the physical universe, it would not have satisfied his idea of artistic imitation; for all the arts imitate human life in some of its manifestations, and imitate material objects only so far as these serve to interpret spiritual and mental processes. The decorative element in Greek architecture is alone 'imitative' in the Aristotelian sense, being indeed but a form of sculpture; but sculpture does not constitute the building, nor is it, as in Gothic architecture, an organic part of the whole. The metopes in a Greek temple are, as it were, a setting for a picture, a frame into which sculptural representations may be fitted, but the frame is not always filled in. The temple itself, though constructed according to the laws of the beautiful, though realising, as we might say, the idea of the beautiful, yet is not 'imitative'; it does not, according to Greek notions, rank as fine art.

From the course of the foregoing argument we gather that a work of art is an image of the impressions or 'phantasy pictures' made by an independent reality upon the mind of the artist, the reality thus reflected being the facts of human life and human nature. To this we must make one addition, which contains the central thought of Aristotle's doctrine. Imitative art in its highest form, namely poetry, is an expression of the universal element in human life.<sup>1</sup> If we may expand Aristotle's idea in the light of his own system,—fine art eliminates what is transient and particular and reveals the permanent and essential features of the original. It discovers the 'form' (εἶδος) towards which an object tends, the result which nature strives to attain, but rarely or never can attain. Beneath the individual it finds the universal. It passes beyond the bare reality given by nature, and expresses a purified form of reality disengaged from accident, and freed from conditions which thwart its development. The real and the ideal from this point of view are not opposites, as they are sometimes conceived to be. The ideal is the real, but rid of contradictions, unfolding itself according to the laws of its own being, apart from alien influences and the disturbances of chance.

We can now see the force of the phrase τὸ βέλτιον, as applied in the Poetics<sup>1</sup> to the creations of poetry and art. It is identical in meaning with the οἷα εἶναι δεῖ of ch. xxv. § 1, and the οἷους δεῖ (? εἶναι)<sup>2</sup> of § 6. The 'better' and the 'ought to be' are not to be taken in the moral, but in the aesthetic sense. The expression 'the better' is, indeed, almost a technical one in Aristotle's general philosophy of nature, and its meaning and associations in that connexion throw light on the sense it bears when transferred to the sphere of Art. Aristotle distinguishes the workings of inorganic and organic nature. In the former case, the governing law is the law of necessity: in the latter, it is purpose or design; which purpose, again, is identified with 'the better'<sup>3</sup> or 'the best.'<sup>1</sup> Nature, often baffled in her intentions,<sup>2</sup> thwarted by unfavourable matter or by human agency, yet tends towards the desirable end. She can often enlist even the blind force of necessity as her ally, giving a new direction to its results.<sup>3</sup> Wherever organic processes are in operation, order and proportion are in varying degrees apparent. The general movement of organic life is part of a progress to the 'better,' the several parts working together for the good of the whole. The artist in his mimic world carries forward this movement to a more perfect completion. The creations of his art are framed on those ideal lines that nature has drawn: her intimations, her guidance are what he follows. He too aims at something better than the actual. He produces a new thing, not the actual thing of experience, not a copy of reality, but a βέλτιον, or higher reality—'for the ideal type must surpass the actual';<sup>4</sup> the ideal is 'better' than the real.

Art, therefore, in imitating the universal imitates the ideal; and we can now describe a work of art as an idealised representation of human life—of character, emotion, action—under forms manifest to sense.

'Imitation,' in the sense in which Aristotle applies the word to poetry, is thus seen to be equivalent to 'producing' or 'creating according to a true idea,' which forms part of the definition of art in general.<sup>1</sup> The 'true idea' for fine art is derived from the εἶδος, the general concept which the intellect spontaneously abstracts from the details of sense. There is an ideal form which is present in each individual phenomenon but imperfectly manifested. This form impresses itself as a sensuous appearance on the mind of the artist; he seeks to give it a more complete expression, to bring to light the ideal which is only half revealed in the world of reality. His distinctive work as an artist consists in stamping the given material with the impress of the form which is universal. The process is not simply that which is described by Socrates in the conversation he is reported to have held in the studio of Parrhasius, by which the artist, who is no servile copyist, brings together many elements of beauty which are dispersed in nature.<sup>1</sup> It is not enough to select, combine, embellish,—to add here and to retrench there. The elements must be harmonised into an ideal unity of type.

‘Imitation,’ so understood, is a creative act. It is the expression of the concrete thing under an image which answers to its true idea. To seize the universal, and to reproduce it in simple and sensuous form is not to reflect a reality already familiar through sense perceptions; rather it is a rivalry of nature, a completion of her unfulfilled purposes, a correction of her failures.

If, however, the ‘imitation’ which is the principle of fine art ultimately resolves itself into an effort to complete in some sense the work of nature, how, then, it may be asked, does fine art, after all, differ from useful art? We have seen that the character of the useful arts is to co-operate with nature, to complete the designs which she has been unable to carry out. Does not Aristotle's distinction, then, between the two forms of art disappear? To the question thus raised Aristotle offers no direct answer; nor perhaps did he put it to himself in this form. But if we follow out his thought, his reply would appear to be something of this kind. Nature is a living and creative energy, which by a sort of instinctive reason works in every individual object towards a specific end. In some domains the end is more clearly visible than in others; the higher we carry our observation in the scale of existence the more certainly can the end be discerned. Everywhere, however, there is a ceaseless and upward progress, an unfolding of new life in inexhaustible variety. Each individual thing has an ideal form towards which it tends, and in the realisation of this form, which is one with the essence (οὐσία) of the object, its end is attained.<sup>1</sup> Nature is an artist who is capable indeed of mistakes, but by slow

<sup>1</sup> The τέλος of an object is τὸ τέλος τῆς γενέσεως or κινήσεως, the term of the process of the movement. The true οὐσία or φύσις of a thing is found in the attainment of its τέλος,—that which the thing has become when the process of development is completed from the matter (ύλη) or mere potential existence (δύναμις) to form (εἶδος) or actuality (ἐντελέχεια). Phys. ii. 2. 194 a 28, ἡ δὲ φύσις τέλος καὶ οὐ ἔνεκα· ὅν γὰρ συνεχοῦς τῆς κινήσεως οὕσης ἔστι τι τέλος τῆς κινήσεως, τοῦτο ἔσχατον καὶ οὐ ἔνεκα. advances and through many failures realises her own idea.<sup>1</sup> Her organising and plastic power displays itself in the manifest purpose which governs her movements. Some of the humbler members of her kingdom may appear mean if taken singly and judged by the impression they make upon the senses. Their true beauty and significance are visible to the eye of reason, which looks not to the material elements or to the isolated parts but to the structure of the whole.<sup>2</sup> In her structural

<sup>2</sup> Cf. de Part. Anim. i. 5. 645 a 4 sqq., 'Having already treated of the celestial world, as far as our conjectures could reach, we proceed to treat of animals, without omitting, to the best of our ability, any member of the kingdom, however ignoble. For if some have no graces to charm the sense (πρὸς τὴν αἰσθησιν), yet even these, by disclosing to intellectual perception the artistic spirit that designed them, give immense pleasure to all who can trace links of causation and are inclined to philosophy (κατὰ τὴν θεωρίαν ὅμως ἢ δημιουργήσασα φύσις ἀμηχάνους ἡδονὰς παρέχει τοῖς δυναμένοις τὰς αἰτίας γνωρίζειν καὶ φήσει φιλοσόφοις). Indeed it would be strange if mimic representations of them were attractive because they disclose the constructive skill of the painter or sculptor, and the original realities themselves were not more interesting, to all at any rate that have eyes to discern the reason that presided over their formation' (Ogle's Trans.).

The thought of the shaping and plastic power of nature is in one form or another a persistent one in Greek philosophy and literature. In Plato (Soph. 265 B sqq.) God is the divine artist; in the Stoics nature, 'artifex,' 'artificiosa,' fashions by instinct works which human skill cannot equal (Cic. de Nat. D. ii. 22); with them the universe is the divine poem. In Plotinus God is artist and poet. In Dion Chrysostom (Ὁλιμπ. Or. xii. 416 B) Ζεὺς is πρῶτος καὶ τελειότατος δημιουργός: in Philostratus ὡγράφος ὁ θεός.

faculty lies nature's perfection. With her the attainment of the end 'holds the place of the beautiful.'<sup>1</sup>

Now, art in its widest sense starts from a mental conception of the ideal as thus determined.<sup>2</sup> Useful art, employing nature's own machinery, aids her in her effort to realise the ideal in the world around us, so far as man's practical needs are served by furthering this purpose. Fine art sets practical needs aside; it does not seek to affect the real world, to modify the actual. By mere imagery it reveals the ideal form at which nature aims in the highest sphere of organic existence,—in the region, namely, of human life, where her intention is most manifest, though her failures too are most numerous. Resembling nature in a certain instinctive yet rational faculty, it does not follow the halting course of nature's progress. The artist ignores the intervening steps, the slow processes, by which nature attempts to bridge the space between the potential and the actual. The form which nature has been striving, and perhaps vainly striving, to attain stands forth embodied in a creation of the mind. The ideal has taken concrete shape, the finished product stands before us, nor do we ask how it has come to be what it is. The flaws and failures incident to the natural process are removed, and in a glorified appearance we discern nature's ideal intention. Fine art, then, is a completion of nature in a sense not applicable to useful art; it presents to us only an image, but a purified image of nature's original.<sup>1</sup>

Such would appear to be Aristotle's position. We may here note the difference between this view and the attitude adopted by Plato towards fine art, especially in the Republic; remembering, however, that Plato was capable of writing also in another strain and in a different mood.<sup>2</sup> Starting from the notion of pure Being he found reality only in the world of ideas, sensible phenomena being but so many images which at best remind us of the celestial archetype. To him Becoming was the simple antithesis of Being; it meant the world of change, the sphere of phenomena, the region in which the individual life appears for a moment and then vanishes away. The poet or painter holds up a mirror to material objects—earth, plants, animals, mankind—and catches a reflexion of the world around him, which is itself only the reflexion of the ideal.<sup>1</sup> The actual world therefore stands nearer to the idea than the artistic imitation, and fine art is a copy of a copy, twice removed from truth.<sup>2</sup> It is conversant with the outward shows and semblances of things, and produces its effects by illusions of form and colour, which dupe the senses. The imitative artist does not need more than a surface acquaintance with the thing he represents. He is on a level below the skilled craftsman whose art is intelligent and based on rational principles, and who alone has a title to be called a 'maker' or creator. A painter may paint a table very admirably without knowing anything of the inner construction of a table, a knowledge which the carpenter, who would fashion it for its proper end, must possess. And poets, too, whose ideas of men are formed on a limited experience,<sup>1</sup> cannot pass beyond the range of that experience, they have no insight into the nature of man, into the human soul as it is in itself; this can be attained only by philosophic study.

The fundamental thought of Aristotle's philosophy, on the other hand, is Becoming not Being; and Becoming to him meant not an appearing and a vanishing away, but a process of development, an unfolding of what is already in the germ, an upward ascent ending in Being which is the highest object of knowledge. The concrete individual thing is not a shadowy appearance but the primary reality. The outward and material world, the diverse manifestations of nature's life, organic and inorganic, the processes of birth and decay, the manifold forms of sensuous beauty, all gained a new importance for his philosophy. Physical science, slighted by Plato, was passionately studied by Aristotle. Fine art was no longer twice removed from the truth of things; it was the manifestation of a higher truth, the expression of the universal which is not outside of and apart from the particular, but presupposed in each particular. The work of art was not a semblance opposed to reality, but the image of a reality which is penetrated by the idea, and through which the idea shows more apparent than in the actual world. Whereas Plato had laid it down that 'the greatest and fairest things are done by nature, and the lesser by art, which receives from nature all the greater and primeval creations and fashions them in detail,'<sup>1</sup> Aristotle saw in fine art a rational faculty which divines nature's unfulfilled intentions, and reveals her ideal to sense. The illusions which fine art employs do not cheat the mind; they image forth the immanent idea which cannot find adequate expression under the forms of material existence.

Some critics, it may be observed, have attempted to show that the fundamental principles of fine art are deduced by Aristotle from the idea of the beautiful. But this is to antedate the theory of modern aesthetics, and to read into Aristotle more than any impartial interpretation can find in him. The view cannot be supported except by forced inferences, in which many links of the argument have to be supplied, and by extracting philosophical meanings of far-reaching import out of chance expressions. Aristotle's conception of fine art, so far as it is developed, is entirely detached from any theory of the beautiful—a separation which is characteristic of all ancient aesthetic criticism down to a late period. Plotinus, working out Plato's ideas with the modifications required by his own mysticism, attempted to determine the idea of the beautiful as a fundamental problem of art, and with it to solve the difficult and hitherto neglected problem as to the meaning of the ugly. He based his theory of fine art on a particular conception of the beautiful; but Aristotle is still far removed from this point of view. While he assumes almost as an obvious truth that beauty is indispensable in a work of art, and essential to the attainment of its end, and while he throws out hints as to the component elements of the beautiful,<sup>1</sup> he has nowhere analysed that idea, nor did he perhaps regard the beautiful, in its purely aesthetic sense, as forming a separate domain of philosophic inquiry. It is useless, out of the fragmentary observations Aristotle has left us, to seek to construct a theory of the beautiful. He makes beauty a regulative principle of art, but he never says or implies that the manifestation of the beautiful is the end of art. The objective laws of art are deduced not from an inquiry into the beautiful, but from an observation of art as it is and of the effects which it produces.

POETIC TRUTH

WHAT is true of fine art in general is explicitly asserted by Aristotle of poetry alone, to which in a unique manner it applies. Poetry expresses most adequately the universal element in human nature and in life. As a revelation of the universal it abstracts from human life much that is accidental. It liberates us from the tyranny of physical surroundings. It can disregard material needs and animal longings. Thought disengages itself from sense and makes itself supreme over things outward. 'It is not the function of the poet,' says Aristotle, 'to relate what has happened, but what may happen,—what is possible according to the law of probability or necessity. The poet and the historian differ not by writing in verse or in prose. The work of Herodotus might be put into verse, and it would still be a species of history, with metre no less than without it. The true difference is that one relates what has happened, the other

what may happen.’<sup>1</sup> The first distinguishing mark, then, of poetry is that it has a higher subject matter than history; it expresses the universal (τὰ καθόλου) not the particular (τὰ καθ’ ἑκάστων), the permanent possibilities of human nature (οἷα ἂν γένοιτο); it does not merely tell the story of the individual life, ‘what Alcibiades did or suffered.’<sup>2</sup>

Though we may be inclined to take exception to the criticism which appears to limit history to dry chronicles, and to overlook the existence of a history such as that of Thucydides,<sup>3</sup> yet the main thought here cannot be disputed. History is based upon facts, and with these it is primarily concerned; poetry transforms its facts into truths. The history of Herodotus, in spite of the epic grandeur of the theme and a unity of design, which though obscured is not effaced by the numerous digressions, would still, as Aristotle says, be history and not poetry even if it were put into verse. Next, poetry exhibits a more rigorous connexion of events; cause and event are linked together in ‘probable or necessary sequence’ (κατὰ τὸ εἰκὸς ἢ τὸ ἀναγκαῖον). Historical compositions, as Aristotle observes in a later chapter, are a record of actual facts, of particular events, strung together in the order of time but without any clear causal connexion.<sup>1</sup> Not only in the development of the plot<sup>2</sup> but also in the internal working of character,<sup>3</sup> the drama observes a stricter and more logical order than that of actual experience. The rule of probability which Aristotle enjoins is not the narrow vraisemblance which it was understood to mean by many of the older French critics, which would shut the poet out from the higher regions of the imagination and confine him to the trivial round of immediate reality. The incidents of every tragedy worthy of the name are improbable if measured by the likelihood of their everyday occurrence,—improbable in the same degree in which characters capable of great deeds and great passions are rare. The rule of ‘probability,’ as also that of ‘necessity,’ refers rather to the internal structure of a poem; it is the inner law which secures the cohesion of the parts.

The reading of the MSS. ἱστορίας τὰς συνήθεις makes an intolerably harsh form of inverted comparison, and Dacier's conjecture above given is possibly right: 'the structure (of the epic) should not resemble the histories. . . .' But I strongly incline to M'Vey's correction (mentioned in Preface, p. xvii.) οἷας for ὁμοίως; no further change is then needed. The Arabic version, as I learn from Professor Margoliouth, has no equivalent for συνήθεις and seems to point, but by no means certainly, to συνθέσεις.

The ‘probable’ is not determined by a numerical average of instances; it is not a condensed expression for what meets us in the common course of things. The εἰκός of daily life, the empirically usual, is derived from an observed sequence of facts, and denotes what is normal and regular in its occurrence, the rule, not the exception.<sup>1</sup> But the rule of experience cannot be the law that governs art. The higher creations of poetry move in another plane. The incidents of the drama and the epic are not those of ordinary life: the persons, who here play their parts, are not average men and women. The ‘probable’ law of their conduct cannot be deduced from commonplace experience, or brought under a statistical average. The thoughts and deeds, the will and the emotions of a Prometheus or a Clytemnestra, a Hamlet or an Othello, are not an epitomised rendering of the ways of meaner mortals. The common man can indeed enter into these characters with more or less intelligence, just because of their full humanity. His nature is for the moment enlarged by sympathy with theirs: it dilates in response to the call that is made on it. Such characters are in a sense better known to us—γνωριμώτεροι—than our everyday acquaintances. But we do not think of measuring the intrinsic probability of what they say or do by the probability of meeting their counterpart in the actual world.

Few writers have grasped more firmly than Aristotle the relation in which poetical truth stands to empirical fact. He devotes a great part of one chapter (ch. xxv.) to an inquiry into the alleged untruths and impossibilities of poetry. He points out the distinction between errors affecting the essence of the poetic art, and errors of fact relating to other arts.<sup>1</sup> We may here set aside the question of minor oversights, inconsistencies, or technical inaccuracies, holding with him that these are not in themselves a serious flaw, provided they leave the total impression unimpaired. But there is a more fundamental objection which he boldly meets and repels. The world of poetry, it is said, presents not facts but fiction: such things have never happened, such beings have never lived. 'Untrue' (οὐκ ἀληθῆ), 'impossible' (ἀδύνατα), said the detractors of poetry in Aristotle's day: 'these creations are not real, not true to life.' 'Not real,' replies Aristotle, 'but a higher reality' (ἀλλὰ βέλτιον), 'what ought to be (ὡς δεῖ), not what is.'<sup>1</sup> Poetry, he means to say, is not concerned with fact, but with what transcends fact; it represents things which are not, and never can be in actual experience; it gives us the 'ought to be'; the form that answers to the true idea.<sup>2</sup> The characters of Sophocles,<sup>3</sup> the ideal forms of Zeuxis,<sup>4</sup> are unreal only in the sense that they surpass reality. They are not untrue to the principles of nature or to her ideal tendencies.

It would seem that in Aristotle's day it was still generally held that 'real events'—under which were included the accepted legends of the people<sup>5</sup>—were alone the proper subjects for tragedy. Names and incidents were alike to be derived from this source. The traditional practice was critically defended by an argument of this kind:—‘what has happened is possible: what is possible alone is πιθανόν,—likely, that is, to gain credence.’<sup>1</sup> In ch. ix. Aristotle pleads for an extension of the idea of the ‘possible,’ from τὰ γινόμενα to οἷα ἂν γένοιτο, from the δυνατά of history to those ‘universal’ δυνατά where the law of causation appears with more unbroken efficacy and power. He would not restrict the poet’s freedom of choice. At the same time he guards himself against being supposed utterly to condemn historical or real subjects. Indeed from many passages we may infer that he regarded the consecrated legends of the past as the richest store-house of poetic material, though few only of the traditional myths satisfied, in his opinion, the full tragic requirements. The rule of ‘what may happen’ does not, he observes, exclude ‘what has happened.’ Some real events have that internal probability or necessity which fits them for poetic treatment.<sup>2</sup> It is interesting to notice how guarded is his language—‘some real events,’ as if by a rare and happy chance.<sup>1</sup> And, no doubt, in general the poet has to extract the ore from a rude mass of legendary or historical fact: to free it from the accidental, the trivial, the irrelevant: to purify it, in a word, from the dross which always mingles with empirical reality. Even those events which possess an inherent poetical quality, which are, in some sense, poetry ready made for the dramatist, are poetical only in certain detached parts and incidents, not penetrated with poetry throughout. They will need the idealisation of art before they can be combined into the unified structure of the drama. The hints given in subsequent chapters for treating the traditional legends show how all-important in Aristotle's eyes is the shaping activity of the artist, even when he is dealing with the most favourable material. Greek tragedies, though 'founded on fact'—as the phrase goes—transmute that fact into imaginative truth.

The truth, then, of poetry is essentially different from the truth of fact. Things that are outside and beyond the range of our experience, that never have happened and never will happen, may be more true, poetically speaking,—more profoundly true than those daily occurrences which we can with confidence predict. These so-called ἀδύνατα

‘What has never anywhere come to pass, that alone never grows old.’<sup>1</sup>

There is another class of ‘impossibilities’ in poetry, which Aristotle defends on a somewhat different ground. It is the privilege, nay, the duty, of the poet ψευδῇ λέγειν ὡς δεῖ, ‘to tell lies skilfully’: he must learn the true art of fiction.<sup>2</sup> The fiction here intended is, as the context shows, not simply that fiction which is blended with fact in every poetic narrative of real events.<sup>3</sup> The reference here is rather to those tales of a strange and marvellous character,<sup>4</sup> which are admitted into epic more freely than into dramatic poetry. In this art of feigning, Homer, we are told, is the supreme master; and the secret of the art lies in a kind of παραλογισμός or fallacy. The explanation added, though given in a somewhat bald and abstract manner, renders the nature of the fallacy perfectly plain.<sup>1</sup> At the outset the poet must be allowed to make certain primary assumptions and create his own environment. Starting from these poetic data—the pre-suppositions of the imagination—he may go whither he will, and carry us with him, so long as he does not dash us against the prosaic ground of fact. He

<sup>2</sup> Post. xxiv. 9. Homer, Hesiod, and the poets generally had been accused by Plato of ‘telling lies’ (ψεύδεσθαι) and not even doing so ‘properly’: Rep. ii. 377 E, ἀλλῶς τε καὶ ἐάν τις μὴ καλῶς ψεύδεται. And τὸ μέγιστον καὶ περὶ τῶν μεγίστων ψεύδος ὁ εἰπὼν οὐ καλῶς ἐψεύσατο. Aristotle transfers the καλῶς from the region of morality into that of art, and discovers a merit in the point of censure. Cf. Dion Chrysa. Or. xi. 315 B: ἀνδρείοτατος ἀνθρώπων ἦν πρὸς τὸ ψεύδος Ὅμηρος καὶ οὐδὲν ἡττον ἐθάρρει καὶ ἐσεμνύνετο ἐπὶ τῷ ψεύδεσθαι ἢ τῷ ἀληθῆ λέγειν. Homer was in fact ‘splendide mendax.’

<sup>1</sup> The fallacy, namely, of inferring that because a given thing is the necessary consequent of a given antecedent, the consequent necessarily implies the antecedent. Antecedent and consequent are wrongly assumed to be reciprocally convertible; cf. de Soph. Elench. 167 b 1 sqq., an example being, 'if it rains, the ground is wet: the ground is wet: therefore it rains.' Similarly in Rhetoric the skilled speaker adopts a certain appropriate tone and manner which leads the audience to infer that the facts he states are true: Rhet. iii. 7. 1408 a 20, πιθανοὶ δὲ τὸ πρᾶγμα καὶ ἡ οἰκεία λέξις· παραλογίζεται γὰρ ἡ ψυχὴ ὡς ἀληθῶς λέγοντος, ὅτι ἐν τοῖς τοιούτοις οὕτως ἔχουσιν, ὥστ' οἴονται, εἰ καὶ μὴ οὕτως ἔχει, ὡς ὁ λέγων, τὰ πράγματα οὕτως ἔχειν. Cf. Rhet. iii. 12. 1414 a 1 sqq., iii. 16. 1416 a 36 sqq. Twining (ii. 356) compares the observation of Hobbes that 'probable fiction is similar to reasoning rightly from a false principle.'

The allusion to the Nέκττα in Poet. xxiv. 10 is, doubtless, as Vahlen (Beitr. p. 296) shows, to Odyssey xix. 164–260. The disguised Odysseus has told Penelope that he has entertained Odysseus in Crete. The detailed description he gives of the appearance, dress, etc., of the hero is recognised by Penelope to be true. She falsely infers that, as the host would have known the appearance of the guest, the stranger who knew it had actually been the host.

feigns certain imaginary persons, strange situations, incredible adventures. By vividness of narrative and minuteness of detail, and, above all, by the natural sequence of incident and motive, things are made to happen exactly as they would have happened had the fundamental fiction been fact. The effects are so plausible, so life-like, that we yield ourselves instinctively to the illusion, and infer the existence of the supposed cause. For the time being we do not pause to dispute the πρῶτον ψεῦδος or original falsehood on which the whole fabric is reared.

Such is the essence of τὸ πιθανόν, which in various forms runs through the teaching of the Poetics. By artistic treatment things incredible in real life wear an air of probability. The impossible not only becomes possible, but natural and even inevitable. In the phraseology of the Poetics, the ἄλογα, things impossible or improbable to the reason, are so disguised that they become εὐλογα: the ἀδύνατα, things impossible in fact, become πιθανά, and hence δυνατὰ κατὰ τὸ εἰκὸς ἢ τὸ ἀναγκαῖον. Even the laws of the physical world and the material conditions of existence may conceivably be neglected, if only the inner consistency of the poetry is not sacrificed. The magic ship of the Phaeacians and the landing of Odysseus on the shores of Ithaca, which 'might have been intolerable if treated by an inferior poet,' are so skilfully managed by Homer that we forget their inherent impossibility.<sup>1</sup> 'Probable impossibilities are,' as Aristotle declares with twice repeated emphasis, 'to be preferred to improbable possibilities.'<sup>2</sup>

The ἄλογα or 'irrational elements' which the logical understanding rejects, are greater stumbling-blocks to the poetic sense than mere material impossibilities. For the impossible may cease to be thought of as such; it may become logically inevitable. But the irrational is always liable to provoke the logical faculty into a critical or hostile attitude. It seems to contradict the very law of causality to which the higher poetry is subject. It needs, therefore, a special justification, if it is to be admitted at all; and this justification Aristotle discovers in the heightened wonder and admiration, which he regards as proper, in a peculiar degree, to epic poetry.<sup>3</sup> The instance twice cited<sup>4</sup> of the pursuit of Hector in the Iliad illustrates the general conditions under which he would allow this license. The scene here alluded to is that in which Achilles chases Hector round the walls of Troy: the Greek army stands motionless, Achilles signing to them to keep still.<sup>1</sup> The incident, if represented on the stage, would appear highly improbable, and even ludicrous. The poetic illusion would be destroyed by the scene being placed directly before the eyes; whereas in epic narrative, the effect produced is powerfully imaginative. Still, even as an epic incident, Aristotle appears—strangely enough—to think that it is open to some censure, and justified only by two considerations. First, the total effect is impressive: we experience a heightened wonder, a pleasurable astonishment, which effaces the sense of incongruity and satisfies the aesthetic end.<sup>2</sup> In the next place, a like effect could not have been produced by other means.<sup>3</sup>

totle, may be admitted into poetry. Some things there are which cannot be defended either as the expression of a higher reality, or as constituting a whole so coherent and connected that we acquiesce in them without effort. They refuse to fit into our scheme of the universe, or to blend with the other elements of our thought. Still, it may be, they are part of the traditional belief, and are enshrined in popular legend or superstition. If not true, they are believed to be true. Though they cannot be explained rationally, it is generally felt that there is 'something in them.' Current beliefs like these cannot be wholly ignored or rudely rejected by the poet. There are stories of the gods, of which it is enough to say that, whether true or false, above or below reality, 'yet so runs the tale.'<sup>1</sup> The principle here laid down will apply to the introduction of the marvellous and supernatural under many forms in poetry. But a distinction ought perhaps to be drawn. Take a case where the imagination of a people, such as the Greeks, has been long at work upon its own mythology, and has embodied in clear poetic form certain underlying sentiments and convictions of the race. Facts in themselves marvellous or supernatural have taken coherent shape, and been inwrought into the substance of the national belief. The results so obtained may be at variance with empirical fact, yet they are none the less proper material for the poet. The legends may be among the ἀδύνατα of experience; they are not among the ἄλογα of poetry. It may even be within the power of the poet to efface the lines between the natural and the supernatural, and to incorporate both worlds in a single order of things, at once rational and imaginative.

Meanwhile, within the legends or traditions so clarified, there remains, we will suppose, some unassimilated material, unharmonised elements which offend the reason. A mythology which has sprung out of childlike intuitions into the truth of things, combined with a childlike ignorance of laws and facts, cannot but retain vestiges of the irrational. It is to these cruder beliefs, which come to the surface even in Hellenic poetry, that the defence to which we now allude will more especially apply:—‘untrue indeed, nay irrational, but so men say.’

Aristotle holds that the irrational—whether under the guise of the supernatural, or under the form of motiveless human activity—is less admissible in dramatic than in epic poetry.<sup>1</sup> He does not assign the reason, but it is obvious. The drama is a typical representation of human action: its mainspring is motive: what is motiveless or uncaused is alien to it. Following strict rules of art Aristotle would exclude the irrational altogether: failing that, he would admit it only under protest and subject to rigid limitations. It may form part of the supposed antecedents of the plot; it has no place within the dramatic action itself.<sup>2</sup> Aristotle summarily rejects the plea that if it is kept out the plot will be destroyed. ‘Such a plot,’ he says, ‘should not in the first instance be constructed.’<sup>3</sup> But he proceeds to qualify this harsh sentence by a characteristic concession to human infirmity. He will view the fault leniently, if the incidents in question are made in any degree to look plausible.<sup>4</sup>

From what has been said it will be evident that a material impossibility admits of artistic treatment; hardly so, a moral improbability. When once we are placed at the poet's angle of vision and see with his eyes, the material improbability presents no insuperable difficulty. The chain of cause and effect remains unbroken. Everything follows in due sequence from the acceptance of the primary fiction. But a moral improbability is an ἄλογον of a more stubborn kind. No initial act of imaginative surrender can reconcile us to a course of action that is either motiveless or based on unintelligible principles. We can sooner acquiesce in the altered facts of physical nature than in the violation of the laws which lie at the root of conduct. The instances of the irrational which Aristotle condemns are not indeed confined to moral improbabilities. But he appears to have had these mainly in his mind,—improbabilities that ultimately depend on character, and do violence either to the permanent facts of human nature, or to the feelings and motives proper to a particular situation. Such are the ignorance of Oedipus as to the manner of Laius' death: the speechless journey of Telephus from Tegea to Mysia:<sup>1</sup> the scene already mentioned of the pursuit of Hector. A material improbability may itself, again, often be resolved into one of the moral kind. Where the events either in themselves or in their sequence appear irrational, they are frequently the outcome of character inwardly illogical. Though Aristotle does not distinguish between moral and material improbability or impossibility, it falls in with his teaching to recognise in the first a grave artistic defect, which is not necessarily inherent in the second. In the unbroken chain of cause and effect which he postulates for the drama, each of the links is formed by the contact of human will with outward surroundings. The necessity which pervades his theory of tragedy is a logical and moral necessity, binding together the successive moments of a life, the parts of an action, into a significant unity.

Since it is the office of the poet to get at the central meaning of facts, to transform them into truths by supplying vital connexions and causal links, to set the seal of reason upon the outward semblances of art, it follows that the world of poetry rebels against the rule of chance. Now, accident (τὸ συμβεβηκός) or chance in Aristotle, exhibiting itself under two forms not always strictly distinguished,<sup>1</sup> owes its existence to the uncertainty and variability of matter.<sup>2</sup> It is the negation

It is true that the action of Chance does not invariably defeat the purposes of Nature or Art. It may so happen that the first step in a natural or an artistic process is the result of Chance.<sup>1</sup> To Chance were due some of the early experiments in the history of poetry, which were destined to lead to ultimate success.<sup>2</sup> But in itself Chance is the very antithesis of Art. It is an irrational cause; it suggests anarchy and misrule; it has no proper place in poetry, which aims at the attainment of an ideal unity. The law of 'the probable'—as well as that of 'the necessary'—excludes chance;<sup>3</sup> and yet in a popular sense nothing is more 'probable' than the occurrence of what is called accident. We gather from the Poetics that the introduction of anomalous and abnormal incidents in poetry was sometimes defended by the saying of Agathon: 'It is probable that many things should happen contrary to probability.'<sup>4</sup> A similar saying appears to have been current by way of mitigating the appearance of monstrosities in nature: 'The unnatural is occasionally, and in a fashion, natural.'<sup>5</sup>

But as a man of science Aristotle does not regard the deviation from nature as in a proper sense natural: nor, as a writer on art, does he lend his authority to the twice quoted phrase of Agathon. That phrase, indeed, violates the spirit, if not the letter, of all that he has written on dramatic probability. 'Miss Edgeworth,' says Newman,<sup>1</sup> 'sometimes apologises for certain incidents in her tales, by stating that they took place "by one of those strange chances which occur in life, but seem incredible when found in writing." Such an excuse evinces a misconception of the principle of fiction, which being the perfection of the actual, prohibits the introduction of any such anomalies of experience.' The 'strange chances' here spoken of, the 'anomalies of experience,' are in fact the 'improbable possibilities'<sup>2</sup> which Aristotle disallows. For chance with its inherent unreason is as far as possible banished by him from the domain of poetry,—except indeed where the skill of the poet can impart to it an appearance of design.<sup>3</sup> Nor does this exclusion hold good only in the more serious forms of poetry. It has been held by some modern writers, that comedy differs from tragedy in representing a world of chance, where law is suspended and the will of the individual reigns supreme. But this is not in accordance with the Poetics. The incidents of comedy—at least of such comedy as Aristotle approves—are ‘framed on lines of probability.’<sup>1</sup> The connexion of incidents is, no doubt, looser than in tragedy; the more rigorous rule of ‘probability or necessity’ is not prescribed: and the variation of phrase appears to be not without design. Yet the plot even of comedy is far removed from the play of accident.

To sum up in a word the results of this discussion. The whole tenor and purpose of the Poetics makes it abundantly clear that poetry is not a mere reproduction of empirical fact, a picture of life with all its trivialities and accidents. The world of the possible which poetry creates is more intelligible than the world of experience. The poet presents permanent and eternal facts, free from the elements of unreason which disturb our comprehension of real events and of human conduct. In fashioning his material he may transcend nature, but he may not contradict her; he must not be disobedient to her habits and principles. He may recreate the actual, but he must avoid the lawless, the fantastic, the impossible. Poetic truth passes the bounds of reality, but it does not wantonly violate the laws which make the real world rational.

Thus poetry in virtue of its higher subject matter and of the closer and more organic union of its parts acquires an ideal unity that history never possesses ; for the prose of life is never wholly eliminated from a record of actual facts. The Baconian and the Aristotelian view of poetry, instead of standing in sharp contrast as is sometimes said, will be seen to approximate closely to one another. The well-known words of Bacon run thus :—

‘Therefore, because the acts or events of true history have not that magnitude which satisfieth the mind of man, Poesy feigneth acts and events greater and more heroical ; . . . because true history representeth actions and events more ordinary and less interchanged, therefore Poesy endueth them with more rareness : so as it appeareth that Poesy serveth and conferreth to magnanimity, morality, and delectation. And, therefore, it was ever thought to have some participation of divineness, because it doth raise and erect the mind, by submitting the shows of things to the desires of the mind, whereas Reason doth buckle and bow the mind unto the nature of things.’<sup>1</sup>

It may be noticed that the opposition between the poet and the historian in the Poetics is incidentally introduced to illustrate the sense in which a tragedy is one and a whole.<sup>1</sup> These two notions as understood by Aristotle are not identical. A unity is composed of a plurality of parts which cohere together and fall under a common idea, but are not necessarily combined in a definite order. The notion of a whole implies something more. The parts which constitute it must be inwardly connected, arranged in a certain order, structurally related, and combined into a system. A whole is not a mere mass or sum of external parts which may be transposed at will, any one of which may be omitted without perceptibly affecting the rest.<sup>2</sup> It is a unity which is unfolded and expanded according to the law of its own nature, an organism which develops from within. By the rule, again, divinitatis cuiuspiam particeps videri possit; quia animum erigit et in sublime rapit; rerum simulacra ad animi desideria accommodando, non animum rebus (quod ratio facit et historia) submittendo.' In the sentence above omitted Poetry is said to correct history, setting forth 'exitus et fortunas secundum merita et ex lege Nemeseos.' This is not Aristotelian.

of beauty, which is a first requirement of art, a poetic creation must exhibit at once unity and plurality. If it is too small the whole is perceived but not the parts; if too large the parts are perceived but not the whole.<sup>1</sup> The idea of an organism evidently underlies all Aristotle's rules about unity;<sup>2</sup> it is tacitly assumed as a first principle of art, and in one passage is expressly mentioned as that from which the rule of epic unity is deduced. 'The plot must, as in a tragedy, be dramatically constructed; it must have for its subject a single action, whole and complete, with a beginning, a middle, and an end. It will thus resemble a

<sup>1</sup> Poet. xxiii. 1, δὲ τοὺς μύθους καθάπερ ἐν ταῖς τραγωδίαις συνιστάναι δραματικούς καὶ περὶ μίαν πρᾶξιν ὅλην καὶ τελείαν, ἔχουσιν ἀρχὴν καὶ μέσα καὶ τέλος, ἢ ὥσπερ ζῶον ἐν ὅλῳ ποιῇ τὴν οἰκείαν ἡδονήν. Here, as in vii. 4–5, ζῶον appears to be the picture of a ζῶον, for ‘it would surely be absurd to talk of an animal as giving an οἰκεία ἡδονή.’ So writes Mr. R. P. Hardie (in Mind, vol. iv. No. 15), adding that in Phaedrus 264 c (quoted p. 189) the word γεγραμμένα puts the matter beyond doubt. His reasoning in favour of ζῶον as bearing this meaning also in vii. 4–5 seems convincing, and, moreover, justifies the reading σωμάτων of the MSS. in § 5. 1451 a 3. ‘The reference to painting, it is true, has been doubted, but I think on insufficient grounds. It depends on the interpretation of the word ζῶον, which is Aristotle’s usual example of a homonym. The two contexts from which the meaning has to be determined are these:—ἐπεὶ τὸ καλὸν καὶ ζῶον καὶ ἅπαν πρᾶγμα ὃ συνέστηκεν ἐκ τινῶν οὐ μόνον ταῦτα τεταγμένα δεῖ ἔχειν . . . : and ὥστε δεῖ καθάπερ ἐπὶ τῶν σωμάτων καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν ζῶων . . . οὕτω καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν μύθων. The meaning of πρᾶγμα ὃ συνέστηκεν ἐκ τινῶν and τὰ σώματα seems plain from other passages in Aristotle, for instance de Anima 412 a 11, where he identifies οὐσία ὡς συνθέτη (substantia composita) with σώματα, and divides these into φυσικὰ σώματα and the rest, the former class again being divided according as they are ἔμψυχα or ἄψυχα. Thus animated bodies would seem to be “composite” in the fullest sense of the word. “ζῶον” then in the present passage in the Poetics must be equivalent to “picture,” in which sense, however, it would naturally suggest to a Greek the picture of a ζῶον in the sense of σῶμα ἔμψυχον.’

According to this interpretation of vii. 4–5, one of the conditions of τὸ καλόν, namely a certain μέγεθος, is illustrated by a comparison between painting and poetry.

For other examples of ζῶον in a similar sense cf. Plat. Lysis, ii. 669 A, πάντες μέντ’ ἂν . . . τὰ καλὰ τῶν ζῶων ἐγινώσκομεν. vi. 769 A, and C, εἴαν τι σφάλῃται τὸ ζῶον ὑπὸ χρόνου. orat. 425 A, 429 A, οὐκοῦν οἱ μὲν ἀμείνονες τὰ αὐτῶν ἔργα καλλίως παρέχονται, τὰ ζῶα, οἱ δὲ φαυλότερα; 430 D, ἐπ’ ἀμφοτέροις

Plato in the Phaedrus had insisted that every artistic composition, whether in prose or verse, should have an organic unity. 'You will allow that every discourse ought to be constructed like a picture of a living organism, having its own body and head and feet; it must have middle and extremities, drawn in a manner agreeable to one another and to the whole.'<sup>1</sup> Aristotle took up the hint; the passage above quoted from the Poetics is a remarkable echo of the words of the Phaedrus; and indeed the idea may be said to be at the basis of his whole poetic criticism.

A work then of poetic art, as he conceives it, while it manifests the universal is yet a concrete and individual reality, a coherent whole, animated by a living principle—or by something which is at least the counterpart of life—and framed according to the laws of organic beauty. The artistic product is not indeed in a literal sense alive; for life or soul is in Aristotle the result of the proper form being impressed upon the proper matter.<sup>1</sup> Now, in art the matter depends on the choice of the artist; it has no necessary relation to the form which is impressed on it. That form it passively receives, but it is not thereby endowed with any active principle of life or movement. The form or essence lives truly only in the mind of the artist who conceived the work, and it is in thought alone that it is transferred to the dead matter with which it has no natural affinity. The artist or the spectator who has entered into the artist's thought, by a mental act lends life to the artistic creation; he speaks, he thinks of it as a thing of life; but it has no inherent principle of movement; it is in truth not alive but merely the semblance of a living reality.<sup>2</sup>

Returning now to the discussion about poetry and history we shall better understand Aristotle's

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Stewart, Eth. Nic. ii. 42: 'τέχνη realises its good in an external ἔργον, and the εἶδος which it imposes on ύλη is only a surface form—very different from the forms penetrating to the very heart of the ύλη, which φύσις and ἀρετή produce (cf. Eth. Nic. ii. 6. 9, ἢ δ' ἀρετὴ πάσης τέχνης ἀκριβεστέρα καὶ ἀμείνων ἐστὶν ὥσπερ καὶ ἡ φύσις: Met. 30. 1070 a 7, ἡ μὲν οὖν τέχνη ἀρχὴ ἐν ἄλλῳ, ἡ δὲ φύσις ἀρχὴ ἐν αὐτῷ).'

general conclusion, which is contained in the words so well known and so often misunderstood: 'Poetry is a more philosophical and a higher thing than history,'<sup>1</sup>—where σπουδαιότερον denotes 'higher in the scale';<sup>2</sup>—not 'more serious,' for the words apply even to comedy, nor, again, 'more moral,' which is quite alien to the context;—and the reason of the higher worth of poetry is that it approaches nearer to the universal, which itself derives its value from being a 'manifestation of the cause'<sup>3</sup> or first principle of things. Poetry in striving to give universal form to its own creations reveals a higher truth than history, and on that account is nearer to philosophy. But though it has a philosophic character it is not philosophy: 'It tends to express the universal.' The μᾶλλον is here a limiting and saving expression; it marks the endeavour and direction of poetry, which cannot however entirely coincide with philosophy.

The capacity of poetry is so far limited that it expresses the universal not as it is in itself, but as seen through the medium of sensuous imagery.

Plato, while condemning the poetry of his own country, had gone far towards merging an ideal poetry in philosophy. The artist who is no mere imitator, whose work is a revelation to sense of eternal ideas, being possessed by an imaginative enthusiasm which is akin to the speculative enthusiasm of the philosopher, from the things of sense ascends to that higher region where truth and beauty are one. Aristotle's phrase in this passage of the Poetics might, in like manner, appear almost to identify poetry with philosophy. But if we read his meaning in the light of what he says elsewhere and of the general system of his thought, we see that he does not confound the two spheres though they touch at a single point. Philosophy seeks to discover the universal in the particular; its end is to know and to possess the truth, and in that possession it reposes. The aim of poetry is to represent the universal through the particular, to give a concrete and living embodiment of a universal truth.<sup>1</sup> The universal of poetry is not an abstract idea ; it is particularised to sense, it comes before the mind clothed in the form of the concrete, presented under the appearance of a living organism whose parts are in vital and structural relation to the whole.*

<sup>1</sup> Cf. R. P. Hardie (in Mind, vol. iv. No. 15): 'We must keep in mind that for poetry it is essential that this (i.e. the universal) element should be expressed in matter of some sort. It is in this respect that science differs from poetry. The whole aim of the former is to keep the εἶδος abstract, and therefore science uses not εἰκόνας but σημεία or σύμβολα, which never really express the

It is the more necessary to insist on this because Aristotle's own analytical criticism may easily lead to a misconception of his meaning. In applying the method of logical abstraction to the organic parts of a poetic whole he may appear to forget that he is dealing not with a product of abstract thought but with a concrete work of art. The impression may be confirmed by a hasty reading of a later chapter,<sup>1</sup> where the poet is advised first to set forth his plot in its general idea (ἐκτίθεσθαι καθόλου), abstracting the accidental features of time, place, and persons, and afterwards to fill it in with detail and incident and with proper names. This order of composition is recommended whether the poet takes his plot from the traditional cycle of legends or draws upon his own invention. The example selected by Aristotle is the story of Iphigenia. As a piece of practical advice the value of the suggestion may well be questioned. But even if we pronounce the method to be faulty and unpoetical, the doctrine of the 'universal' is in no way affected. The use of the word καθόλου

in two such different contexts must not mislead us. The καθόλου of ch. xvii. denotes the broad outline, the bare sketch of the plot, and is wholly distinct from the καθόλου of ch. ix., the general or universal truth which poetry conveys.

The process by which the poetic imagination works is illustrated by Coleridge from the following lines of Sir John Davies<sup>1</sup> :—

‘ Thus doth she, when from individual states
She doth abstract the universal kinds,
Which then re clothed in divers names and fates Steal access thro’ our senses to our minds.’

The meaning is not that a general idea is embodied in a particular example—that is the method of allegory rather than that of poetry—but that the particular case is generalised by artistic treatment. ‘The young poet,’ says Goethe, ‘must do some sort of violence to himself to get out of the mere general idea. No doubt this is difficult; but it is the very life of art.’ ‘A special case requires nothing but the treatment of a poet to become universal and poetical.’ With this Aristotle would have agreed. Goethe, who tells us that with him ‘every idea rapidly changed itself into an image,’ was asked what idea he meant to embody in his Faust. ‘As if I knew myself and could inform them. From heaven, through the world, to hell, would indeed be something; but this is no idea, only a course of action. . . . It was, in short, not in my line, as a poet, to strive to embody anything abstract. I received in my mind impressions and those of a sensuous, animated, charming, varied, hundredfold kind, just as a lively imagination presented them; and I had, as a poet, nothing more to do than artistically to round them off and elaborate such views and impressions, and by means of a lively representation so to bring them forward that others might receive the same impression in hearing or reading my representation of them.’<sup>1</sup>

Coleridge in giving his adhesion to Aristotle’s theory thinks it necessary to guard against the misconstruction to which that doctrine is exposed. ‘I adopt,’ he says, ‘with full faith the theory of Aristotle that poetry as poetry is essentially ideal, that it avoids and excludes all accident; that its apparent individualities of rank, character, or occupation, must be representative of a class; and that the persons of poetry must be clothed with generic attributes, with the common attributes of the class; not such as one gifted individual might possibly possess, but such as from his situation it is most probable that he would possess.’ And he adds in a note, ‘Say not that I am recommending abstractions, for these class characteristics which constitute the instructiveness of a character are so modified and particularised in each person of the Shakespearian drama, that life itself does not excite more distinctly that sense of individuality which belongs to real existence. Paradoxical as it may sound, one of the essential properties of geometry is not less essential to dramatic excellence; and Aristotle has accordingly required of the poet an involution of the universal in the individual. The chief differences are, that in geometry it is the universal truth, which is uppermost in the consciousness; in poetry the individual form, in which the truth is clothed.'<sup>1</sup>

Some of these explanatory words themselves are, it must be owned, misleading. Such phrases as 'representative of a class,' 'generic attributes,' 'class characteristics which constitute the instructiveness of a character,' seem to imply a false view of the 'universal' of poetry; as though the 'individuality' were something outside the universal and of no poetic account; yet, he says, 'the individual form' is 'uppermost.' One might think that the 'universal' was a single abstract truth instead of being all the truths that meet in the individual. The expression, however, 'such (attributes) as from his situation it is most probable that he would possess' is true and Aristotelian.

Still it is in the main the same thought which runs through Aristotle, Goethe, and Coleridge,—that the poet while he seems to be concerned only with the particular is in truth concerned with quod semper quod ubique. He seizes and reproduces a concrete fact, but transfigures it so that the higher truth, the idea of the universal shines through it.

THE END OF FINE ART

WE have seen what Aristotle means by 'imitation' as an aesthetic term. We now ask, What is the end of 'imitative' art? Here Aristotle draws a sharp distinction. The arts called 'useful' either provide the necessary means of existence and satisfy material wants, or furnish life with its full equipment of moral and intellectual resources. Their end is subordinate to another and ulterior end. The end of the fine arts is to give pleasure (πρὸς ἡδονήν) or rational enjoyment<sup>1</sup>

οὐ γὰρ ἐν ταῖς τοιαύταις διαγωγαῖς ἡ εὐδαιμονία, it has a baser application to σωματικαὶ ἡδοναί. As an elevated and noble enjoyment it is associated with σχολή in Pol. iv. (vii.) 15. 1334 a 16. Under this aspect it admits of special application to the two spheres of art and philosophy. In Pol. v. (viii.) 5. 1339 a 25 it is joined with φρόνησις and stands for the higher aesthetic enjoyment which music affords. From a 30-31 it appears that the musical διαγωγή is an end in itself, and therefore distinct from a παιδιά. In Pol. v. (viii.) 5. 1339 b 14 sqq. three ends are mentioned which music may serve—παιδεία, παιδιά, and διαγωγή, and the last is said to combine τὸ καλόν with ἡδονή, both of which elements enter into εὐδαιμονία. Its reference is to the life and thought in Eth. Nic. x. 7. 1177 a 27, where it is applied to the activity of the speculative reason, and in Met. xi. 7. 1072 b 14, where it denotes the activity of the divine thought. Thus the higher διαγωγή, artistic or philosophic, is the delight which comes from the ideal employment of leisure (cf. τὴν ἐν τῇ σχολῇ διαγωγὴν Pol. v. (viii.) 3. 1338 a 21); it is among the blissful moments which constitute εὐδαιμονία. Cf. Pol. v. (viii.) 3. 1338 a 1, τὸ δὲ σχολάζειν ἔχειν αὐτὸ δοκεῖ τὴν ἡδονὴν καὶ τὴν εὐδαιμονίαν καὶ τὸ ζῆν μακαρίως.

man for fresh exertion, and is of value as a means to further work; it has in it no element of that well-being or happiness which is the supreme end of life.<sup>1</sup>

Though Aristotle does not assign to the different kinds of art their respective ranks, or expressly say that the pleasure of tragedy is superior to that of comedy, the distinction he draws between various forms of music may be taken as indicating the criterion by which he would judge of other arts. Music, apart from its other functions, may serve as an amusement for children, it is a toy which takes the place of the infant's rattle;<sup>2</sup> or, again, it may afford a noble and rational enjoyment and become an element of the highest happiness to an audience that is capable of appreciating it.<sup>3</sup> Again, Aristotle asserts that the ludicrous in general is inferior to the serious,<sup>4</sup> and counts as a pastime that fits men for serious work. We may probably infer that the same principle holds in literature as in life; that comedy is merely a form of sportive activity; the pleasure derived from it is of corresponding quality, it ranks with the other pleasures of sport or recreation. But art in its highest idea is one of the serious activities of the mind which constitute the final well-being of man. Its end is pleasure, but the pleasure peculiar to that state of rational enjoyment in which perfect repose is united with perfect energy. It is not to be confounded with the pleasure found in the rude imitations of early art, arising from the discovery of a likeness. \ One passage of the Poetics might indeed<sup>1</sup> if it stood alone lead us to this inference.<sup>1</sup> The instinct for knowledge, the pleasure of recognition, is there the chief factor in the enjoyment of some at least of the more developed arts. But the reference appears to be rather to the popular appreciation of a likeness than to true aesthetic enjoyment. This is perhaps borne out by the explanation elsewhere given of the pleasure derived from plastic or pictorial imitations of the lower forms of animal life.<sup>2</sup> These objects do not come within the range of artistic imitation as understood by Aristotle; they do not reproduce the human and mental life with which alone art is concerned. But they give occasion for the display of workman-like skill; and afford a pleasure analogous to that which comes from the contemplation of nature in her adaptation of means to ends.

Aristotle was perhaps inclined unduly to accentuate the purely intellectual side of pictorial and plastic art. But in his treatment of poetry, which holds the sovereign place among the fine arts, he makes it plain that aesthetic enjoyment proper proceeds from an emotional rather than from an intellectual source. The main appeal is not to the reason but to the feelings. In a word, fine art and philosophy, while they occupy distinct territory, each find their complete fruition in a region bordering on the other. The glow of feeling which accompanies the contemplation of what is perfect in art is an elevated delight similar in quality to the glow of speculative thought. Each is a moment of joy complete in itself, and belongs to the ideal sphere of supreme happiness.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Introduction to Hegel's Philosophy of Fine Art, translated by B. Bosanquet, London, 1886, p. 12: 'It is no doubt the case that art can be employed as a fleeting pastime, to serve the ends of pleasure and entertainment, to decorate our surroundings, to impart pleasantness to the external conditions of our life, and to emphasise other objects by means of ornament. In this mode of employment art is indeed not independent, not free, but servile. But what we mean to consider is the art which is free in its end as in its means. . . . Fine art is not real art till it is in this sense free,

Some points of difference between Plato and Aristotle are at once apparent. Pleasure to Plato was a word of base associations and a democratic pleasure was doubly ignoble. An imitative art like music is liable to become a corrupting influence, if for no other reason, because it seeks to please the masses.<sup>1</sup> Poetry, again, has something of the same taint; it is a kind of rhetoric,<sup>2</sup> a pleasant flattery addressed to mixed audiences, and falls therefore into the same group with the art of sophistry, the art of personal adornment, and the art of the pastry-cook, all of which look not to what is best or truly wholesome but to the pleasure of the moment.<sup>3</sup> The vulgar opinion that musical excellence is measured by pleasure seems to Plato a sort of blasphemy;<sup>4</sup> if pleasure is to be taken as a criterion at all, it should be that of the 'one man pre-eminent in virtue and education.'<sup>5</sup> Even in the Philebus, where the claims of pleasure, and especially of and only achieves its highest task when it has taken its place in the same sphere with religion and philosophy.'

aesthetic pleasure, are more carefully analysed and weighed than elsewhere, the highest or unmixed pleasures rank but fifth in the scale of goods. Aristotle does not share Plato's distrust of pleasure. In the Ethics while he admits to the full its power to mislead the judgment, and compares its gracious but dangerous influence to that of Helen among the elders of Troy;<sup>1</sup> while he speaks slightly of the pleasures of the mass of men who 'can form no idea of the noble and the truly pleasant whereof they have never tasted,'<sup>2</sup> yet he insists on the necessity of being trained to feel pleasure and pain at the right objects; he never hints that pleasure ought to be suppressed as in itself an evil; nay, it is a normal accompaniment of the exercise of every healthy organ and faculty, it perfects that exercise as an added completeness, 'like the bloom of health on the face of the young.'<sup>3</sup> In the passage of the Metaphysics (i. 1) already referred to, the discoverers of the fine arts are said to be 'wiser' than the discoverers of the useful arts for the very reason that the former arts minister to pleasure, not to use.

Again, to Plato poetry and painting and the companion arts, as affording at the best a harmless pleasure,<sup>1</sup> are of the nature of a pastime,<sup>2</sup>—a pastime, it may be, more ‘artistic and graceful’<sup>3</sup> than any other kind, but which still contrasts unfavourably with medicine, husbandry, and gymnastics, which have a serious purpose and co-operate with nature.<sup>4</sup> Imitative art, in short, is wanting in moral earnestness; it is a jest, a sport, child’s-play upon the surface of things. Even comedy, however, is not entirely excluded in the Laws.<sup>5</sup> It may serve an educational end; for the serious implies the ludicrous, and opposites cannot be understood without opposites. The citizens, therefore, may witness the representation of comedy on the stage in order to avoid doing what is ludicrous in life; but only under the proviso that the characters shall not be acted except by slaves.

<sup>5</sup> Laws vii. 816 D-E. Even Molière professes to hold that ‘the business of comedy is to correct the vices of men’ (Preface to Tartuffe).

Aristotle distinguishes as we have seen between art as a pastime and art as a rational employment of leisure. Comedy and the lower forms of art he would probably rank as a pastime, but not so art in its higher manifestations. Tragedy is the imitation of an action that is the very opposite of a pastime, a serious action (πράξις σπουδαία), which is concerned with the supreme good or end of life ; and the art which reproduces this aspect of life is itself a serious art.

The end, then, of fine art, according to Aristotle's doctrine, is a certain pleasurable impression produced upon the mind of the hearer or the spectator. We must be careful here not to import the later idea that the artist works merely for his own enjoyment, that the inward satisfaction which the creative act affords is for him the end of his art. No such conception of the artist's dignity was formed in Greece, where in truth the artist was honoured less than his art. His professional skill seemed to want something of a self-sufficing and independent activity ; and though the poet stood higher in popular estimation than his fellow-artists, because he did not, like the painter and sculptor, approach to the condition of a manual labourer or as a rule make a trade of his work, he too was one who worked not for himself but for others, and so far fell short of a gentlemanly leisure. Aristotle's theory has regard to the pleasure not of the maker, but of the 'spectator' (θεατής) who contemplates the finished product. Thus while the pleasures of philosophy are for him who philosophises—for the intellectual act is an end in itself—the pleasures of art are not for the artist but for those who enjoy what he creates; or if the artist shares at all in the distinctive pleasure which belongs to his art, he does so not as an artist but as one of the public.

To those who are familiar with modern modes of thinking it may seem a serious defect in the theory of Aristotle that he makes the end of art to reside in a pleasurable emotion, not in the realisation of a certain objective character that is necessary to the perfection of the work. An artistic creation, it may be said, is complete in itself; its end is immanent not transcendental. The effect that it produces, whether that effect be immediate or remote, whether it be pleasure or moral improvement, has nothing to do with the object as it is in its essence and inmost character. The true artist concerns himself with external effects as little as does nature herself in the vital processes which are directed towards an end. It was a signal merit, we are reminded, in Aristotle's general philosophical system, that the end of an object is inherent in that object, and is reached when the object has achieved its specific excellence and fulfils the law of its own being.<sup>1</sup> Why, it is said, did not Aristotle see that a painting or a poem, like a natural organism, attains its end not through some external effect but in realising its own idea? If the end of art is to be found in a certain emotional effect, in a pleasure which is purely subjective, the end becomes something arbitrary and accidental, and dependent on each individual's moods. Plato had already shown the way to a truer conception of fine art, for greatly as he misjudged the poetry of his own country, yet he had in his mind the vision of a higher art which should reveal to sense the world of ideas. Here there was at least an objective end for fine art. Aristotle's own definition too of art as 'a faculty of production in accordance with a true idea'<sup>2</sup> is quoted as showing that he was not far from assigning to fine art an end more consistent with his whole system. If art in general is the faculty of realising a true idea in external form, he might easily have arrived at a definition of fine art not essentially different from the modern conception of it as the revelation of the beautiful in external form.

of some inconsistency of treatment. According to his general theory of Aesthetics as a branch of Art, its end ought to be the purely objective end of realising the εἶδος in concrete form. But in dealing with particular arts, such as poetry and music, he assumes a subjective end consisting in a certain pleasurable emotion. There is here a formal contradiction from which there appears to be no escape. It would seem that Aristotle in generalising from the observed effects of works of art raises the subjective side of fine art into a prominence which is hardly in keeping with his whole philosophical system. If we seek to develop his line of thought, we may say that the artist, pursuing an end which is external to his productive activity, attains that end when the work of art comes into existence,—that is, when the process of change (γένεσις) is complete, when the matter (ύλη) has been impressed with the artistic form (εἶδος), and the potential has been developed into the actual.<sup>1</sup> How are we to know that this end has been attained? By the hedonistic effect produced on the mind of the percipient subject. The work of art is in its nature an appeal to the senses and imagination of the person to whom it is presented; its perfection and success depend on a subjective impression. It attains to complete existence only within the mind, in the pleasure which accompanies this mode of mental activity (ἐνέργεια). Thus the productive activity of the artist is not unnaturally subordinated to the receptive activity of the person for whom he produces.

In Aristotle the true nature of a thing can be expressed by means of that which it is 'capable of doing or suffering' (πέφυκε ποιεῖν ἢ πάσχειν). Its effect is treated as synonymous with its essential quality.<sup>1</sup> So it is in a work of art. If indeed we desire to characterise precisely its emotional effect we must do so by reference to the content of the activity. But the work of art and its effect being inseparable, the artistic object can loosely be spoken of in terms of the emotion it awakens.<sup>2</sup> This view does not, however, make the function of art to depend upon accident and individual caprice. The subjective emotion is deeply grounded in human nature, and thence acquires a kind of objective validity. As in ethics Aristotle assumes a man of moral insight (ὁ φρόνιμος) to whose trained judgment the appreciation of ethical questions is submitted, and who, in the last resort, becomes the 'standard and the law' of right,<sup>1</sup> so too in fine art a man of sound aesthetic instincts (ὁ χαρίεις) is assumed, who is the standard of taste, and to him the final appeal is made. He is no mere expert, for Aristotle distrusts the verdict of specialists in the arts<sup>2</sup> and prefers the popular judgment,—but it must be the judgment of a cultivated public. Both in the Politics and in the Poetics he distinguishes between the lower and the higher kind of audience.<sup>3</sup> The 'free and educated listener' at a musical performance is opposed to one of the vulgar sort. Each class of audience enjoys a different kind of music and derives from the performance such pleasure as it is capable of. The inferior kind of enjoyment is not to be denied to those who can appreciate only the inferior type of music—better that they should like this music than none at all—but the lower pleasure is not to be taken as the true end of the musical art.<sup>1</sup>

In Rhet. i. 3. 1358 a 37 the τέλος of the art is in relation to the ἀκροατής: σύγκειται μὲν γὰρ ἐκ τριῶν ὁ λόγος, ἐκ τε τοῦ λέγοντος καὶ περὶ οὗ λέγει καὶ πρὸς ὃν, καὶ τὸ τέλος πρὸς τοῦτόν ἐστι, λέγω δὲ τὸν ἀκροατήν.

In the theatre, again, it is noted that tragic poets are tempted to gratify the weakness of their audience by making happy endings to their tragedies. The practice is not entirely forbidden; only, it is insisted, such compositions do not afford the characteristic tragic pleasure, but one that properly belongs to comedy.<sup>2</sup> In fine, the end of any art is not 'any chance pleasure,'<sup>3</sup> but the

In Probl. xviii. 4. 916 b 36, the art of the musician and of the actor aims only at pleasure: διὰ τί ῥήτορα μὲν καὶ στρατηγὸν καὶ χρηματιστὴν λέγομεν δεινόν, ἀνλητὴν δὲ καὶ ὑποκριτὴν οὐ λέγομεν; ἢ ὅτι τῶν μὲν ἡ δύναμις ἀνευ πλεονεξίας (ἡδονῆς γὰρ στοχαστικὴ ἐστὶ), τῶν δὲ πρὸς τὸ πλεονεκτεῖν;

For the phrase τὴν τῶν θεάτρων ἀσθένειαν cf. Rhet. iii. 18. 1419 a 18, οὐ γὰρ οἷόν τε πολλὰ ἐρωτᾶν διὰ τὴν ἀσθένειαν τοῦ ἀκροατοῦ, i.e. you cannot (in debate, etc.) put a series of questions on account of the incapacity of a popular audience to follow a long chain of reasoning. Rhet. iii. 1. 1404 a 8, διὰ τὴν τοῦ ἀκροατοῦ μοχθηρίαν.

pleasure which is distinctive of the art. To the ideal spectator or listener, who is a man of educated taste and represents an instructed public, every fine art addresses itself; he may be called 'the rule and standard' of that art, as the man of moral insight is of morals; the pleasure that any given work of art affords to him is the end of the art. But this imaginative pleasure has a tacit reference to man not as an isolated individual, but as existing within the social organism. From the Aristotelian, and Greek point of view art is an element in the higher life of the community; the pleasure it affords is an enduring pleasure, an aesthetic enjoyment which is not divorced from civic ends.<sup>1</sup>

Though the end, then, is a state of feeling, it is a feeling that is proper to a normally constituted humanity. The hedonistic effect is not alien to the essence of the art, as has sometimes been thought; it is the subjective aspect of a real objective fact. Each kind of poetry carries with it a distinctive pleasure, which is the criterion by which the work is judged. A tragic action has an inherent capacity of calling forth pity and fear; this quality must be impressed by the poet on the dramatic material;<sup>2</sup> and if it is artistically done, the peculiar pleasure arising out of the union of the pitiable and the terrible will be awakened in the mind of every one who possesses normal human sympathies and faculties. The test of artistic merit in a tragedy is the degree in which it fulfils this, its distinctive function. All the rules prescribed by Aristotle for the tragic poet flow from the same primary requirement,—those which determine the proper construction of the plot, the character of the ideal hero, the best form of recognition and the like. The state of pleasurable feeling is not an accidental result, but is inherently related to the object which calls it forth. Though the pleasure of the percipient is necessary to the fulfilment of the function of any art, the subjective impression has in it an enduring and universal element.

ART AND MORALITY

THE question as to the proper end of fine art was discussed in Greece in its special application to poetry. Two views were currently held. The traditional one, which had gained wide acceptance, was that poetry has a direct moral purpose; the primary function of a poet is that of a teacher. Even after professional teachers of the art of conduct had appeared in Greece the poets were not deposed from the educational office which time had consecrated. Homer was still thought of less as the inspired poet who charmed the imagination than as the great teacher who had laid down all the rules needed for the conduct of life, and in whom were hidden all the lessons of philosophy. The other theory, tacitly no doubt held by many, but put into definite shape first by Aristotle, was that poetry is an emotional delight, its end is to give pleasure. Strabo (circa 24 B.C.) alludes to the two conflicting opinions. Eratosthenes, he says, maintained that 'the aim of the poet always is to charm the mind not to instruct.'<sup>1</sup> He himself holds with the ancients 'that poetry is a kind of elementary philosophy, which introduces us early to life, and gives us pleasurable instruction in reference to character, emotion, action.'<sup>2</sup> The Greek states, he argues, prescribed poetry as the first lesson of childhood; they did so, surely, not merely in order to please, but to afford correction in morals.<sup>3</sup> In carrying the same discipline into mature years they expressed their conviction, that poetry as a regulative influence on morals was adapted to every period of life. In course of time, he observes, philosophical and historical studies had been introduced, but these addressed themselves only to the few, while the appeal of poetry was to the masses.<sup>4</sup> Eratosthenes ought to have modified his phrase and said that the poet writes partly to please and partly to instruct, instead of which he converted poetry into a privileged raconteuse of old wives' fables, with no other object in view than to charm the mind.<sup>5</sup> If, however, poetry is the art which imitates life by the medium of speech, how can one be a poet who is senseless.

and ignorant of life? The excellence of a poet is not like that of a carpenter or a smith; it is bound up with that of the human being. No one can be a good poet who is not first a good man.<sup>1</sup>

This remarkable passage accurately reflects the sentiment which persisted to a late time in Greece, long after the strictly teaching functions of poetry had passed into other hands. It is to be met with everywhere in Plutarch. 'Poetry is the preparatory school of philosophy.'<sup>2</sup> 'It opens and awakens the youthful mind to the doctrines of philosophy.'<sup>3</sup> When first the young hear these doctrines they are bewildered and reject them. 'Before they pass from darkness into full sunshine they must dwell in a kind of twilight, in the soft rays of a truth that is blended with fiction, and so be prepared painlessly to face the blaze of philosophy without flinching.'<sup>4</sup> The novice requires wise guidance 'in order that through a schooling that brings no estrangement he may, as a kindly and familiar friend, be conducted by poetry into the presence of philosophy.’<sup>1</sup>

How deeply the Greek mind was impressed with the moral office of the poet, is shown by the attitude which even Aristophanes feels constrained to take up in relation to his art. He proclaims that the comic poet not only ministers to the enjoyment of the community and educates their taste, he is also a moral teacher and political adviser.<sup>2</sup> ‘Comedy too is acquainted with justice.’<sup>3</sup> It mixes earnest with its fun.<sup>4</sup> In the Parabasis of the Acharnians Aristophanes claims to be the best of poets for having had the courage to tell the Athenians what was right.<sup>5</sup> Good counsel he gives and will always give them; as for his satire it shall never light on what is honest and true.<sup>6</sup> He likens himself elsewhere to another Heracles, who attacks not ordinary human beings, but Cleons and other monsters of the earth, and who in ridding the city of such plagues deserves the title of 'cleanser of the land.'<sup>1</sup>

The censure he passes on Euripides is primarily a moral censure. Even where the judgment may seem to be of an aesthetic kind a moral motive underlies it. Euripides is to him a bad citizen and a bad poet. In him are embodied all the tendencies of the time which the older poet most abhors. He is the spirit of the age personified, with its restlessness, its scepticism, its sentimentalism, its unsparing questioning of old traditions, of religious usages and civic loyalty; its frivolous disputations, which unfit men for the practical work of life, its lowered ideal of courage and patriotism. Every phase of the sophistic spirit he discovers in Euripides. There is a bewildering dialectic which perplexes the moral sense. Duties whose appeal to the conscience is immediate, and which are recognised as having a binding force, are in Euripides subjected to analysis. Again, Euripides is censured for exciting feeling by any means that come to hand. When Dicaeopolis in the Acharnians is about to plead his case with his head on the block, he borrows from Euripides the rags and tatters of his hero Telephus. He carries off with him all the stage properties of woe, so that Euripides exclaims, 'My dear sir, you will rob me of my tragedy.'<sup>1</sup> Tragic pity, Aristophanes implies, is debased in Euripides to an ignoble sentimentalism. Genuine misery does not consist in a beggar's rags or in a hobbling gait. Euripides substitutes the troubling of the senses for genuine tragic emotion.

We are not here concerned with the fairness of the criticism but only with the point of view of the critic; and the coincidence of the moral and aesthetic judgment in Aristophanes is especially noteworthy. He puts into the mouth of Aeschylus, his ideal tragedian, the saying that the poet is the instructor of grown men as the teacher is of youth;<sup>2</sup> and even the comic stage is, according to the theory if not the practice of Aristophanes, the school of the mature citizen.

Aristotle's treatment of poetry in the Poetics stands in complete contrast to this mode of criticism. In the Politics he had already dealt with the fine arts as they present themselves to the statesman and the social reformer. He allows that for childhood the use of poetry and music is to convey moral instruction, and that some forms of poetry, like some kinds of plastic art, exercise a dangerous influence on youth. But the true end of an art is not to be judged by the use to which it may be put in training immature minds. He tacitly combats the position of Plato who admits poetry to his commonwealth only so far as it is subsidiary to moral and political education, and who therefore excludes every form of it except hymns and chants and praises of great and good men, or what goes under the general name of didactic poetry. He distinguishes between educational use and aesthetic enjoyment. For the grown man the poet's function is not that of a teacher, or if a teacher, he is so only by accident. The object of poetry, as of all the fine arts, is to produce an emotional delight, a pure and elevated pleasure. In the Poetics he writes as the literary critic and the historian of poetry. He is no longer concerned with fine art as an institution which the State recognises, and which should form part of an educational system. His inquiry is into the different forms of poetry,—their origin, their growth, the laws of their structure, their effect upon the mind. He analyses poetical compositions as he might the forms of thought. He seeks to discover what they are in themselves, and how they produce their distinctive effects. • The didactic point of view is abandoned. We hear nothing of the direct ethical influence which the several kinds of poetry exert on the spectator or the reader, or of the moral intention of the poet.

In a passage of peculiar interest in ch. xxv. we read, 'The standard of correctness in poetry and politics is not the same, any more than in poetry and any other art.'<sup>1</sup> Aristotle had already insisted that poetical truth and scientific truth are not identical. Poetry is not a metrical version of the facts of medicine, natural science, or history;<sup>2</sup> he now adds that technical inaccuracies in these or other branches of knowledge do not touch the essence of the poetic art.<sup>3</sup> This must be judged by its own laws, its own fundamental assumptions, and not by an alien standard. The observation is extended to the relation of poetry and morality; for the comprehensive phrase 'politics' or 'political science' here, as often, has special reference to ethics. The remark is, doubtless, directed in particular against Plato,<sup>4</sup> whose criticisms of poetry are chiefly from the moral point of view. In the Republic allusion is made to the old idea that Homer knows all the arts, and all the virtues; he is, therefore, the great educator of the people.

Plato disallows this claim; but while admitting that it would not be fair to question Homer about medicine or any of the arts to which his poems only incidentally refer,<sup>1</sup> he urges that in regard to war, generalship, politics, education, which are the main subjects of the poems, we have a right to ask him, what state was ever better governed by his help. Such a test of poetry Aristotle would reject as involving a confusion of standards. Again, in an earlier book of the Republic a still graver censure is passed on epic narrative.<sup>2</sup> The tales of the gods, their battles and dissensions, are condemned for the injurious influence they exercise on character; they are fictions and immoral fictions.<sup>3</sup> So too the cruel and evil deeds ascribed to heroes and demigods are impious and hurtful untruths. On the moral question thus raised Aristotle barely touches in this chapter; his general attitude, however, may be inferred from § 19 (and possibly also from § 8). But on the question of fact, 'true or false,' he says, 'these stories are currently told,' they are the tradition of the people; as such they have their place in poetry.<sup>4</sup>

Again, personal satire had been condemned on moral grounds by Plato.<sup>1</sup> Aristotle agrees in this condemnation, but for a different reason. He ranks it as an inferior type of art not because it encourages low scandal or debases character, but because art ought to represent the general not the particular.<sup>2</sup> Neither in the definition of tragedy (ch. vi. 2), if properly understood, nor in the subsequent discussion of it, is there anything to lend countenance to the view that the office of tragedy is to work upon men's lives, and to make them better. The theatre is not the school. The character of the ideal tragic hero (ch. xiii.) is deduced not from any ethical ideal of conduct, but from the need of calling forth the blended emotions of pity and fear, wherein the proper tragic pleasure resides.<sup>3</sup> The catastrophe by which virtue is defeated and villainy in the end comes out triumphant is condemned by the same criterion;<sup>4</sup> and on a similar principle the prosaic justice, misnamed 'poetical,' which rewards the good man and punishes the

Aristotle's critical judgments on poetry rest on aesthetic and logical grounds, they take no direct account of ethical aims or tendencies. He mentions Euripides some twenty times in the Poetics, and in the great majority of instances with censure. He points out numerous defects, such as inartistic structure, bad character-drawing, a wrong part assigned to the chorus; but not a word is there of the immoral influence of which we hear so much in Aristophanes. In his praise as little as in his blame does Aristotle look to the moral content of a poem. Sophocles he admires not for the purity of his ethical teaching or for his deep religious intuitions, but for the unity which pervades the structure of his dramas, and the closely linked sequence of parts which work up to an inevitable end. Not that Aristotle would set aside as a matter of indifference the moral content of a poem or the moral character of the author. Nay, they are all-important factors in producing the total impression which has to be made upon the hearer. The matter of literature is life; and tragedy is in a special sense the <sup>1</sup> Poet. xiii. 8. Contrast Plato, who would compel the poet to exhibit the perfect requital of vice and virtue (Laws ii. 680 E). So in Rep. iii. 392 A-B poets are forbidden to say that many wicked men are happy and good men miserable, and are commanded to sing in an opposite strain.

'imitation of life,'<sup>1</sup> of human welfare and human misery ; it is the representation of a sustained action of a great and serious kind, in which character finds for itself outward and energetic expression. This fragment of life is typical and interpretative of the whole. The philosopher in whose theory ethics were woven into the very tissue of life, whose fabric of happiness was reared upon a moral basis, and with whom the inward and spiritual order of things dominated the outward, could not have acquiesced in any rendering of life which assigned to its various elements a perverted place and value. Aristotle does not indeed demand of the poet that he shall set before himself a didactic aim, nor does he test the merit of his performance by the moral truths that are conveyed. His test of excellence is pleasure ; but the aesthetic pleasure produced by any ideal imitation must be a sane and wholesome pleasure, which would approve itself to the better portion of the community.<sup>2</sup> The pleasure he contemplates could not conceivably be derived from a poem which offers low ideals of life and conduct and misinterprets human destiny.<sup>3</sup>

In ch. xxv. 19 it is declared that the representation of moral depravity finds its only excuse in 'necessity.' The necessity meant is the inner necessity arising out of the structure of a piece. Vice in itself is undesirable even on the stage. But it may be subservient to the plot—one of those things ἀ βούλεται ὁ μῦθος—demanded by the cogent necessity of dramatic motive. Without it there may not be room for the proper play of contrasted character, for its effect upon the outward course of the incidents; in a word, for the due interaction of all the forces which lead to the catastrophe. Gratuitous or motiveless depravity is, however, forbidden: and as an instance of this fault, Menelaus in the Orestes of Euripides is cited here.<sup>1</sup> Nothing but the constraining needs of literary art are allowed to override the rules laid down for goodness of character in tragedy.

33–40, prove, I think, that there is an aesthetic not a moral reference here in περὶ δὲ τοῦ καλῶς ἢ μὴ καλῶς, and εἰ σποινδαῖον ἢ φαῦλον. 'Speech or action must be interpreted in the light of all the circumstances—the persons, the occasion, the end it is designed to serve; and if, from a study of these, the speech or action shows itself to be in accordance with necessity or probability, then its artistic excellence—and this is ever supreme with Aristotle—is assured. Morality enters into consideration only as implied in the aesthetic ideal.' See the quotations given from the Scholia with explanations of Aristotle, pp. 36 ff.

These rules, it must be owned, are too rigorous on their ethical side. It becomes the more necessary to call attention to them here, as we have dwelt with some emphasis on Aristotle's freedom from a narrowly moral, or moralistic, conception of poetry. This freedom, we now see, is subject to certain limitations. Traces of the older prepossession still survive, and linger around a portion of his doctrine.

In chapter ii. of the Poetics a broad distinction is drawn between the imitative arts, according as they represent persons morally noble (σπουδαίους opposed to φαύλους), ignoble, or of an intermediate type resembling average humanity (ὁμοίους). Some attempt has been made to empty the words σπουδαίους and φαύλους, and the synonymous expressions in the Poetics of any strictly moral content, and to reduce the antithesis to the aesthetic distinction between ideal and vulgar characters. It is indeed true that σπουδαῖος—serving as the adjective of ἀρετή in its widest acceptance,<sup>1</sup> as does φαῦλος of κακία—can denote any one that is good or excellent in his kind or in his special line. Similarly, and with like freedom, it can be applied to any object, animate or inanimate.<sup>1</sup> In its reference to a person, the particular sphere of his excellence is expressed by a limiting phrase or adverbial addition (σπουδαίως τι or περί τι), or by the agreement of the adjective with some noun indicating the range of its application (σπουδαῖος νομοθέτης, καθαριστής and the like).<sup>2</sup> But when the word is used as the epithet of a man as such, without any qualifying reference to occupation, profession, or function, we must take it to mean morally 'good.'<sup>3</sup> Aristotle seems bent on making it plain, here at the outset, that the ethical sense is that which he intends. The parenthetical remark in § 1 shows that the comprehensive ideas summed up in ἀρετή and κακία as applied to morals are covered by the contrasted terms σπουδαίους and φαύλους.<sup>4</sup> After illustrations drawn from various forms of art, the chapter ends with the statement that 'comedy aims at representing men as worse, tragedy as better than in actual life.'<sup>5</sup> Consistent herewith is the observation in

ch. v. 4, that epic poetry agrees with tragedy as being a μίμησις σπουδαίων: and again the requirement of ch. xv. that the characters (ἥθη) shall be χρηστά,<sup>1</sup>—once more ‘good’ in the ethical sense, and barely to be distinguished from σπουδαία.

Aristotle, then, starts from what was, so far as we know, the unquestioned assumption of his time,—that the primary distinction between higher and lower forms of art depended on the different types of moral character represented by them. The same view is reflected everywhere in Plato. In the Laws the taste of the judges (κριταί) at the theatrical competitions is commented on adversely. They ought to be the instructors, they are the mere disciples of the theatre. Their influence reacts upon the poets. Consequently the audience ‘when they ought to be hearing of characters morally better than their own, and receiving a higher pleasure, are affected in an entirely opposite manner.’<sup>2</sup> Again the objects that music ‘imitates’

are 'the characters of men better or worse,'<sup>1</sup>—a distinction verbally the same as in the Poetics ch. ii.

Yet Aristotle, while using the traditional phrases, is feeling after some more satisfactory and vital distinction. The very instances he adduces to illustrate his meaning show that the moral formula is strained to the point of breaking. The characters of Homer (§ 5) are 'better' (βελτίους) than those of ordinary reality, or than those who figure in epic parody, not solely or chiefly through superior virtue, but by powers of willing and feeling, doing and thinking, which raise them above the common herd of men. The example drawn from painting suggests a like conclusion. Three contemporary painters of an earlier date are mentioned, each typical of a certain mode of artistic treatment. 'Polygnotus depicted men as nobler (κρείττους) than they are, Pauson as less noble (χειρόους), Dionysius drew them true to life (ὁμοίους).'<sup>2</sup> Evidently these differences do not correspond to purely ethical distinctions. Roughly we may say that idealistic treatment is exemplified in Polygnotus, realistic in Dionysius, and the tendency to caricature in Pauson. His own examples might have led Aristotle to discard the moral formula, and to seek elsewhere the differentiating marks of artistic representation. As it is, his precise thought is not difficult to discover. Obviously, a perfect art does not, in his view, imply characters of faultless virtue. The sketch of the ideal tragic hero in ch. xiii 3-4 itself precludes such a notion. Another decisive passage is ch. xv. 8. Defective characters—those, for instance, who are irascible or indolent (ὀργίλοι καὶ ῥάθυμοι)—may be ennobled (ἐπιεικεῖς ποιεῖν) by poetic treatment. One of the examples given is the Achilles of Homer, whose leading defect is a passionate temperament, and who would, doubtless, be placed among the ὀργίλοι.<sup>1</sup> Such a character, poetically idealised, conforms to the conditions of goodness (χρηστὰ ἦθῃ) prescribed in this chapter. Even without these express indications we might draw some such inference from a comparison of the phrase μίμησις σπουδαίων (ch. v. 4) applied to epic and tragic poetry, with the description of comedy in ch. v. 1 as a μίμησις φαυλοτέρων μὲν, οὐ μέντοι κατὰ πᾶσαν κακίαν, 'an imitation of characters of a lower type, not however, in the full sense of the word, bad.' The badness which comedy delineates is not coextensive with moral badness. It is explained to be that specific form of badness which consists in an ugliness or deformity of character that is ludicrous. A similar qualification of the kind of goodness that is required in the higher forms of poetry, might naturally be inferred. The phrase μίμησις σπουδαίων would thus imply a restrictive clause, οὐ μέντοι κατὰ πᾶσαν ἀρετήν, 'but not, in the full sense of the word, good.' This missing qualification is, however, partly supplied by the passages of ch. xiii. and ch. xv. above referred to.

The result, then, arrived at is briefly this. According to Aristotle, the characters portrayed by epic and tragic poetry have their basis in moral goodness; but the goodness is of the heroic order. It is quite distinct from plain, unaspiring virtue. It has nothing in it common or mean. Whatever be the moral imperfections in the characters, they are such as impress our imagination, and arouse the sense of grandeur: we are lifted above the reality of daily life. To go farther would be to part company with Aristotle: he would hardly allow that there may be a dignity, an elevation of character, which saves even vice from being contemptible, and brings it under the higher requirements of art. Had he wished to mark the distinctively aesthetic quality of characters grand or elevated, he might have used such expressions as μέγα τι, or οὐδὲν φαῦλον, or οὐδὲν ἀγεννὲς πράττειν (φρονεῖν). The grandeur, however, which he demands is a moral grandeur. Greatness cannot take the place of goodness. Satan, though he were never 'less than archangel ruined,' would be admitted into an epic poem only as one of the rare exceptions already noted.<sup>1</sup>

Aristotle, in respect to the delineation of character, is still on the border-land between morals and aesthetics. Mere goodness does not satisfy him: something, he feels, must be infused into it which does not belong to the prosaic world. But what that is, he does not tell us. He has no adequate perception of the wide difference that separates moral and poetical excellence of character. When he comes to define tragedy, he makes, it would appear, a step in advance, though at the cost of logical consistency. In the definition given in ch. vi., tragedy no longer μιμείται σπουδαίους but is a μίμησις πράξεως σπουδαίας. Here there seems to be a transition to a different sense of the word σπουδαῖος. Logically, it ought, no doubt, to bear the same meaning—'good,' 'noble'—as applied to the tragic action, that it bore in the previous divisions of poetry as applied to the persons whom tragedy represents.<sup>1</sup> But Aristotle imperceptibly glides into the meaning 'serious,' 'elevated,' 'grand,'—a meaning which the word readily admits of in reference to a thing, such as a πρᾶξις, though it could not be so used of a person without the addition of other words or of a qualifying context. This new shade of meaning, which enters into the definition, is required in order to differentiate the tragic action from the γελοία πρᾶξις of Comedy.<sup>2</sup> Aristotle passes lightly from μιμείται σπουδαίους to μίμησις πράξεως σπουδαίας, as if the one expression were merely the equivalent of the other. He can hardly have realised the important bearings of the change by which the word σπουδαῖος is freed from the limited moral reference which attaches to it in ch. ii. If in his observations upon character (τὰ ἥθη) in ch. xv. he had followed out the line of thought which the adjective here suggests as applied to the tragic action, he might have made a notable improvement on his aesthetic theory. In pursuance of this idea, tragedy would have demanded not mere goodness of character (χρηστὰ ἥθη), but a greatness or elevation corresponding to the grandeur of the action.

we may for a moment glance aside to notice one curious chapter in its history. The French critics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries generally took σπουδαῖοι to mean persons of high rank. So strange a perversion of language is hardly credible, and yet it admits of easy explanation. A Roman rule, itself founded on Greek writers subsequent to Aristotle, had prescribed that the fundamental difference between tragedy and comedy is to be sought in the fact, that kings and heroes are the actors in tragedy, ordinary citizens in comedy.<sup>1</sup> This purely outward distinction won acceptance with many distinguished scholars.<sup>2</sup> When the Poetics came to be received as the guide and canon of criticism in France, Aristotelian authority was eagerly sought for this among other literary traditions. With an entire disregard of linguistic usage, the phrase μίμησις σπουδαίων was—in default of any other—seized on as affording the desired sanction. The Abbé d'Aubignac in his book La Pratique du Théâtre, which long continued to be the text-book of French dramatic writers, declares that 'tragedy represents the life of princes,' while 'comedy serves to depict the actions of the people.'<sup>1</sup> Dacier goes even to greater lengths in his note on μίμησις σπουδαίων. 'It is not necessary,' he says, 'that the action which affords matter for an Epic poem be illustrious and important in itself; on the contrary, it may be very ordinary or common; but it must be so by the quality of the persons who act. Thus Horace says plainly, "Res gestae regumque ducumque." This is so true that the most notable action of a citizen can never be made the subject of an epic poem, when the most indifferent one of a king or general of an army will be such, and always with success.'<sup>2</sup> In all this misapprehension there is just one grain of solid fact. Aristotle does undoubtedly hold that the chief actors in tragedy ought to be illustrious by birth and position. The narrow and trivial life of obscure persons cannot give scope for a great and significant action, one of tragic consequence. But nowhere does he make outward rank the distinguishing feature of tragic as opposed to comic representation. Moral nobility is what he demands; and this—on the French stage, or at least with French critics—is transformed into an inflated dignity, a courtly etiquette and decorum, which seemed proper to high rank. The instance is one of many in which literary critics have wholly confounded the teaching of Aristotle.

<sup>2</sup> Dacier on Poet. v. 4, note 17 (Trans. London 1705). Cf. note 9 on ch. xiii., 'Tragedy, as Epic poem, does not require that the action which it represents should be great and important in itself. It is sufficient that it be tragical, the names of the persons are sufficient to render it magnificent; which for that very reason are all taken from those of the greatest fortune and reputation. The greatness of these eminent men renders the action great, and their reputation makes it credible and possible.'

But to return from this digression. Aristotle, as our inquiry has shown, was the first who attempted to separate the theory of aesthetics from that of morals. He maintains consistently that the end of poetry is a refined pleasure. In doing so he severs himself decisively from the older and more purely didactic tendency of Greece. But in describing the means to the end, he does not altogether cast off the earlier influence. The aesthetic representation of character he views under ethical lights, and the different types of character he reduces to moral categories. Still he never allows the moral purpose of the poet or the moral effects of his art to take the place of the artistic end. If the poet fails to produce the proper pleasure, he fails in the specific function of his art. He may be good as a teacher, but as a poet or artist he is bad.

Few of Aristotle's successors followed out this way of thinking; and the prevailing Greek tradition that the primary office of poetry is to convey ethical teaching was carried on through the schools of Greek rhetoric till it was firmly established in the Roman world. The Aristotelian doctrine as it has been handed down to modern times has again in this instance often taken the tinge of Roman thought, and been made to combine in equal measure the utile with the dulce. Sir Philip Sidney, for example, who in his Apologie for Poetrie repeatedly states that the end of poetry is 'delightful teaching,' or 'to teach and to delight,' has no suspicion that he is following the Ars Poetica of Horace rather than that of Aristotle. The view of Sidney was that of the Elizabethan age in general.<sup>1</sup> It was a new departure when Dryden wrote in the spirit of Aristotle: 'I am satisfied if it [verse] cause delight; for delight is the chief if not the only end of poesy: instruction can be admitted but in the second place, for poesy only instructs as it delights.'<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This too was the prevailing view at the Renaissance, but Castelvetro (1570) forms a notable exception. He goes even beyond Aristotle in maintaining that poetry is intended, not only to please, but to please even the vulgar mob (see Spingarn, pp. 55-56).

‘Tragedy is an imitation of an action that is serious, complete, and of a certain magnitude ; in language embellished with each kind of artistic ornament, the several kinds being found in separate parts of the play ; in the form of action,<sup>2</sup> not of narrative ; through pity and fear effecting the proper katharsis, or purgation, of these<sup>3</sup> emotions.’

<sup>3</sup> τῶν τοιούτων has given rise to much misunderstanding. It is not ‘all such emotions’ or ‘these and suchlike emotions,’ but by a frequent and idiomatic use ‘the aforesaid emotions,’ namely, pity and fear. It is with these, and these only, that tragedy is concerned throughout the Poetics. There is probably, as Reinkens (p. 161) says, a delicate reason here for the preference of τῶν τοιούτων over the demonstrative. The ἔλεος and φόβος of the definition, as will be evident in the sequel, are the aesthetic emotions of pity and fear, those which are awakened by the tragic representation. τῶν

The 'several kinds of embellishment' are in the next paragraph explained to be verse and song; verse without music being employed in the dialogue, lyrical song in the choral parts. Tragedy is hereby distinguished from Nomic and Dithyrambic poetry, which use the combined embellishments throughout.<sup>1</sup>

From this definition it appears first, that the genus of tragedy is Imitation. This it has in common with all the fine arts.

Next, it is differentiated from comedy as being a μίμησις πράξεως σπουδαίας, an imitation of an action that is neither γελοία nor φάυλη, neither ludicrous nor morally trivial. It is concerned with a serious end, namely εὐδαιμονία,<sup>2</sup>—that well-being which is the true end of life. It is a picture of human destiny in all its significance. No one English word completely renders σπουδαίας. The translation 'noble,' which has the merit of applying to the characters as well as to the action, yet suggests too much a purely moral quality, while at the same time it does not adequately bring out the implied antithesis to comedy. Grave and great—these are the two ideas contained in the word. Many of the older critics, missing the true import τοιούτων παθημάτων are the emotions of pity and fear which belong to real life. The use of τούτων instead of τοιούτων might have suggested that the feelings were identically the same.

of σπουδαίας, transfer the meaning which they ought to have found here to the later words, μέγεθος ἐχούσης, of the definition. These—as is plain from Aristotle's explanation in ch. vii.—refer to the actual length of the poem. Addison,<sup>1</sup> who does not stand alone in this view, includes under them the greatness or significance of the action (which is in fact denoted by σπουδαίας) and also the internal length or duration of the action, of which Aristotle here says nothing.

Further, tragedy is differentiated in form from Epic poetry as being dramatic, not narrative.

The remainder of the definition describes the specific effect, the proper function (ἔργον) of tragedy,—namely, to produce a certain kind of katharsis. It would be a curious study to collect the many and strange translations that have been given of this definition in the last three hundred years. Almost every word of it has been misinterpreted in one way or another. But after all it contains only two real difficulties. The one lies in the clause concerning the 'several kinds of embellishment.' Fortunately, however, Aristotle has interpreted this for us himself; otherwise it would doubtless have called forth volumes of criticism. The other and more fundamental difficulty relates to the meaning of the katharsis.<sup>1</sup> Here we seek in vain for any direct aid from the Poetics.

<sup>1</sup> Spectator No. 267: 'Aristotle by the greatness of the action does not only mean that it should be great in its nature but also in its duration, or in other words that it should have a due length in it, as well as what we properly call greatness.'

A great historic discussion has centred round the phrase. No passage, probably, in ancient literature has been so frequently handled by commentators, critics, and poets, by men who knew Greek, and by men who knew no Greek. A tradition almost unbroken through centuries found in it a reference to a moral effect which tragedy produces through the 'purification of the passions.' What the precise effect is, and what are the passions on which tragedy works, was very variously interpreted. Corneille, Racine,<sup>2</sup> Lessing,

each offered different solutions, but all agreed in assuming the purely ethical intention of the drama. Goethe protested; but his own most interesting theory<sup>1</sup> is for linguistic reasons quite impossible, nor does it accord with much else that is contained in the Poetics. In 1857 a pamphlet by Jacob Bernays<sup>2</sup> reopened the whole question, and gave a new direction to the argument. His main idea had been forestalled by Italian critics of the Renaissance;<sup>3</sup> afterwards it fell into oblivion; a similar theory was independently struck out by M. Weil in 1847,<sup>4</sup> but it attracted little notice till Bernays set it forth in detail.

Bernays, with equal learning and literary skill, maintained that katharsis here is a medical metaphor,<sup>1</sup> 'purgation,' and denotes a pathological effect on the soul analogous to the effect of medicine on the body. The thought, as he interpreted it, may be expressed thus. Tragedy excites the emotions of pity and fear—kindred emotions that are in the breasts of all men—and by the act of excitation affords a pleasurable relief. The feelings called forth by the tragic spectacle are not indeed permanently removed, but are quieted for the time, so that the system can fall back upon its normal course. The stage, in fact, provides a harmless and pleasurable outlet for instincts which demand satisfaction, and which can be indulged here more fearlessly than in real life.

Plato, it must be remembered, in his attack upon the drama had said that 'the natural hunger after sorrow and weeping' which is kept under control in our own calamities, is satisfied and delighted by the poets.<sup>1</sup> 'Poetry feeds and waters the passions instead of starving them.'<sup>2</sup> Through its tearful moods it enfeebles the manly temper; it makes anarchy in the soul by exalting the lower elements over the higher, and by dethroning reason in favour of feeling. Aristotle held that it is not desirable to kill or to starve the emotional part of the soul, and that the regulated indulgence of the feelings serves to maintain the balance of our nature. Tragedy, he would say, is a vent for the particular emotions of pity and fear. In the first instance, it is true, its effect is not to tranquillise but to excite. It excites emotion, however, only to allay it. Pity and fear, artificially stirred, expel the latent pity and fear which we bring with us from real life, or at least, such elements in them as are disquieting. In the pleasurable calm which follows when the passion is spent, an emotional cure has been wrought.<sup>3</sup>

It is worth noting, as has been pointed out by Bernays, and before him by Twining, that Milton had already apprehended something of the true import of Aristotle's words. In adopting the pathological theory of the effect of tragedy he was, as has been more recently shown, following in the wake of Italian criticism.<sup>1</sup> In his preface to Samson Agonistes he writes :

'Tragedy, as it was anciently composed, hath been ever held the gravest, moralest, and most profitable of all other poems ; therefore said by Aristotle to be of power, by raising pity and fear, or terroure, to purge the mind of those and such-like passions ; that is to temper or reduce them to just measure with a kind of delight stirred up by reading or seeing those passages well imitated.

as in either case the word bears a sense far removed from the original metaphor. But the distinctive method of relief is different in the two cases. The medical katharsis implies relief following upon previous excitation. There is first a ταραχή or κίνησις, then κάθαρσις or ἐκκρωσις. This is of vital moment for the argument. If we lose sight of the metaphor, the significance of the process is missed.

Nor is Nature herself wanting in her own efforts to make good his assertion, for so, in physick, things of melancholick hue and quality are used against melancholy, sour against sour, salt to remove salt humours.' In other words tragedy is a form of homoeopathic treatment, curing emotion by means of an emotion like in kind, but not identical<sup>1</sup>

Aristotle, it would seem, was led to this remarkable theory by observing the effect of certain melodies upon a form of religious ecstasy, or, as the Greeks said, 'enthusiasm,' such as is rarely seen in this country, and whose proper home is in the East. The persons subject to such transports were regarded as men possessed by a god, and were taken under the care of the priesthood. The treatment prescribed for them was so far homoeopathic in character, that it consisted in applying movement to cure movement, in soothing the internal trouble of the mind by a wild and restless music. The passage in the Politics<sup>2</sup> in which Aristotle de-

Of true experience, from this great event
With peace and consolation hath dismissed,
And calm of mind, all passion spent.

scribes the operation of these tumultuous melodies is the key to the meaning of katharsis in the Poetics. Such music is expressly distinguished by Aristotle from the music which has a moral effect or educational value (παιδείας ἐνεκεν). It differs, again, from those forms of music whose end is either relaxation (πρὸς ἀνάπαυσιν) or the higher aesthetic enjoyment (πρὸς διαγωγὴν).<sup>1</sup> Its object is katharsis. It is a physical stimulus which provides an outlet for religious fervour. Patients, who have been subjected to this process, 'fall back,' to quote Aristotle's phrase, 'into their normal state, as if they had undergone a medical or purgative treatment.'<sup>2</sup> The emotional result is a 'harmless joy.'<sup>3</sup>

The homoeopathic cure of morbid 'enthusiasm' by means of music, was, it may be incidentally observed, known also to Plato.<sup>1</sup> In a passage of the Laws,<sup>2</sup> where he is laying down rules for the management of infants, his advice is that infants should be kept in perpetual motion, and live as if they were always tossing at sea. He proceeds to compare the principle on which religious ecstasy is cured by a strain of impassioned music with the method of nurses, who lull their babies to sleep not by silence but by singing, not by holding them quiet but by rocking them in their arms. Fear, he thinks, is in each case the emotion that has to be subdued,—a fear caused by something that has gone wrong within. In each case the method of cure is the same; an external agitation (κίνησις) is employed to calm and counteract an internal.

καθαρτικά παρέχει χαρὰν ἀβλαβῇ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις. Susemihl here accepts Sauppe's emendation πρακτικά for καθαρτικά (see note ad loc.). But the text may well stand if we regard 1342 a 11–15 (ταὐτὸ δὲ τοῦτο . . . κονφίεσθαι μεθ' ἡδονῆς) as parenthetic, and as alluding not to the musical κάθαρσις but to the κάθαρσις of ἔλεος and φόβος in tragedy. Then the words ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ τὰ μέλη τὰ καθ. mark the return to the musical κάθαρσις. (Newman, Pol. vol. iii. 567, retains καθαρτικά, making the sense, 'cathartic melodies as distinguished from the sacred melodies.') For the phrase ἀβλαβῆς ἡδονή see supra, p. 205, and Nic. Eth. vii. 14. 1154 b 4.

But Plato recognised the principle only as it applied to music and to the useful art of nursing. Aristotle, with his generalising faculty and his love of discovering unity in different domains of life, extended the principle to tragedy and hints at even a wider application of it. In the Politics, after explaining the action of the musical katharsis, he adds that 'those who are liable to pity and fear, and, in general, persons of emotional temperament pass through a like experience; . . . they all undergo a katharsis of some kind and feel a pleasurable relief.'<sup>1</sup>

The whole passage of the Politics here referred to is introduced by certain important prefatory words: 'What we mean by katharsis we will now state in general terms (ἀπλῶς); hereafter we will explain it more clearly (ἐροῦμεν σαφέστερον) in our treatise on Poetry.'<sup>2</sup> But in the Poetics, as we have it, the much desired explanation is wanting; there appears to be a gap in the text at this most critical point. We are therefore driven back upon the Politics itself as our primary authority. The tone of the passage and particular expressions show two things plainly—first, that there the term is consciously metaphorical; secondly, that though its technical use in medicine was familiar, the metaphorical application of it was novel and needed elucidation. Moreover, in the words last quoted, —‘all undergo a katharsis of some kind,’—it is pretty plainly implied that the katharsis of pity and fear in tragedy is analogous to, but not identical with, the katharsis of ‘enthusiasm.’

Now, Bernays transferred the katharsis of the Politics almost without modification of meaning to the definition of tragedy. He limited its reference to the simple idea of an emotional relief, a pleasurable vent for overcharged feeling.<sup>1</sup> This idea, no doubt, almost exhausts the meaning of the phrase as it is used in the Politics. It also expresses, as has been above explained, one important aspect of the tragic katharsis. But the word, as taken up by Aristotle into his terminology of art, has probably a further meaning. It expresses not only a fact of psychology or of pathology, but a principle of art. The original metaphor is in itself a guide to the full aesthetic significance of the term. In the medical language of the school of Hippocrates it strictly denotes the removal of a painful or disturbing element from the organism, and hence the purifying of what remains, by the elimination of alien matter.<sup>1</sup> Applying this to tragedy we observe theory rests mainly on the Poetics he adds: 'But Aristotle writes as a critic and is thinking of the effect upon the readers; Keble, as a poet, dwells primarily on the effect upon the poet, and secondarily on that upon the readers.'

<sup>1</sup> Keble's theory of poetry—of the ‘vis medica poeticae,’ as he calls it—may well be compared. It is expounded in his Prælectiones Academicæ, and also in a review of Lockhart's Life of Scott, which has been republished in Keble's Occasional Papers and Reviews. The most important pages of the review are quoted in Prickard (Aristotle on the Art of Poetry), pp. 102 sqq. Dr. Lock (Biography of Keble) sums up the theory thus: ‘Poetry is essentially for him a relief to the poet, a relief for overcharged emotion. It is the utterance of feelings which struggle for expression, but which are too deep for perfect expression at all, much more for expression in the language of daily life.’ Having pointed out that Keble's

- (i) An accusative of the disturbing element which is expelled or purged away: e.g. τὸ περίττωμα, τὰ λυπούντα, τὰ ἄλλο-

that the feelings of pity and fear in real life contain a morbid and disturbing element. In the process of tragic excitation they find relief, and the morbid element is thrown off. As the tragic action progresses, when the tumult of the mind, first roused, has afterwards subsided, the lower forms of emotion are found to have been transmuted into higher and more refined forms. The painful element in the pity and fear of reality is purged away; the emotions themselves are purged. The curative and tranquillising influence that tragedy exercises follows as an immediate accompaniment of the transformation of feeling. Tragedy, then, does τρια. The idea here uppermost is the negative one of removing a foreign substance.

- (ii) An accusative of the object which is purged by this process of removal: e.g. τὸν ἄνθρωπον, τὸ σῶμα, τὴν ψυχὴν, τὰ παθήματα. The idea here uppermost is the positive one of purifying and clarifying the organism, organ, or portion of the system from which the morbid matter is expelled.

Corresponding to this two-fold use of the accusative with the verb we have a twofold use of the genitive with the noun κάθαρσις:—

- (i) κάθαρσις τῶν λυπούντων, τοῦ περιττώματος, τῶν ἑλλοτρίων and the like. To this class belongs the expression in Plato Phaedo 69 c, κάθαρσις τῶν τοιούτων πάντων (sc. τῶν ἡδονῶν), ‘the purging away of these pleasures,’ the pleasures being regarded as not merely containing a morbid element, but as being in themselves morbid; cf. Plut. De Inim. Util. 10. 91 f, τῶν παθῶν τούτων ποιούμενος εἰς τοὺς ἐχθροὺς ἀποκαθάρσεις, ‘expending (or discharging) these feelings upon his enemies’ (in order to rid himself from them).
- (ii) κάθαρσις (‘purgation of’) τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, τοῦ σώματος, τῶν more than effect the homoeopathic cure of certain passions. Its function on this view is not merely to provide an outlet for pity and fear, but to provide for them a distinctively aesthetic satisfaction, to purify and clarify them by passing them through the medium of art.

But what is the nature of this clarifying process? Here we have no direct reply from Aristotle. He has, however, left us some few hints, some materials, out of which we may perhaps reconstruct the outlines of his thought.

The idea of katharsis implies as we have seen, the expulsion of a painful and disquieting element, —τὰ λυποῦντα. Now pity and fear in their relation to real life are by Aristotle reckoned among τὰ λυποῦντα. Each of them is, according to the defini-παθημάτων, where the genitive expresses the person or thing on which the κάθαρσις takes effect.

In the definition of tragedy the genitive seems to fall under (ii). The κάθαρσις τῶν τοιούτων παθημάτων is 'the purgation or purification of the pity and fear' of real life by the expulsion of the morbid element. This element is—it is argued above—a certain pain or λύπη, which again arises from the selfishness which clings to these emotions in actual life.

The interpretation of Bernays, 'the alleviating discharge of these emotions,' implies that the genitive falls under (i). According to this interpretation the cure is effected by the total expulsion of the emotions, instead of by their clarification.

The double meaning of the accusative with καθαίρειν is already foreshadowed in Homer, who employs a double accusative, of the thing and of the person: Iliad xvi. 667—

ἐλθὼν ἐκ βελέων Σαρπηδόνα.

tion in the Rhetoric, a form of pain (λύπη τις). Fear Aristotle defines to be 'a species of pain or disturbance arising from an impression of impending evil which is destructive or painful in its nature.'<sup>1</sup> Moreover, the evil is near not remote, and the persons threatened are ourselves. Similarly, pity is 'a sort of pain at an evident evil of a destructive or painful kind in the case of somebody who does not deserve it, the evil being one which we might expect to happen to ourselves or to some of our friends, and this at a time when it is seen to be near at hand.'<sup>2</sup> Pity, however, turns into fear where the object is so nearly related to us that the suffering seems to be our own.<sup>3</sup> Thus pity and fear in Aristotle are strictly correlated feelings. We pity others where under like circumstances we should fear for ourselves.<sup>4</sup>

Those who are incapable of fear are incapable also of pity.<sup>1</sup>

Thus in psychological analysis fear is the primary emotion from which pity derives its meaning. Its basis is a self-regarding instinct; it springs from the feeling that a similar suffering may happen to ourselves. It has in it a latent and potential fear. But it is a wrong inference to say, as Lessing does,<sup>2</sup> that fear is always an ingredient in pity,—that we fear for ourselves whenever we feel pity for another. The Aristotelian idea simply is that we would fear for ourselves if we were in the position of him who is the object of our pity. The possible fear may never become actual, but the strength of the pity is not thereby impaired. Still the tacit reference to self makes pity, as generally described in the Rhetoric, sensibly different from the pure instinct of compassion, the unselfish sympathy with others'

The conditions of dramatic representation, and above all the combined appeal which tragedy makes to both feelings, will considerably modify the emotions as they are known in actual reality. Pity in itself undergoes no essential change. It has still for its object the misfortunes of 'one who is undeserving' (ὁ ἀνάξιος); which phrase, as interpreted by Aristotle (Poet. ch. xiii.), means not a wholly innocent sufferer, but rather a man who meets with sufferings beyond his deserts. The emotion of fear is profoundly altered when it is transferred from the real to the imaginative world. It is no longer the direct apprehension of misfortune impending over our own life. It is not caused by the actual approach of danger. It is the sympathetic shudder we feel for a hero whose character in its essentials resembles our own.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Poet. xiii. 2, . . . οὔτε ἔλεον οὔτε φόβον, ὁ μὲν γὰρ περὶ τὸν ἀνάξιον ἐστὶν δυστυχοῦντα, ὁ δὲ περὶ τὸν ὅμοιον, ἔλεος μὲν περὶ τὸν ἀνάξιον, φόβος δὲ περὶ τὸν ὅμοιον. I now take this passage in its obvious grammatical sense, 'we feel pity for τὸν ἀνάξιον (cf. quotations from Rhetoric, p. 256 note 2); we feel fear for τὸν ὅμοιον.' At different moments of a play pity or fear will be uppermost according as the course of the action brings home to us more vividly the undeserved nature of the suffering or the moral resemblance between ourselves and the hero.

Thus the φόβος of tragedy is not, like the φόβος of the Rhetoric and of real life, a fear for ourselves. But the fact that fear is inspired by the sufferings of ὁ ὅμοιος indicates that even tragic fear is in the last analysis traced back psychologically to a self-regarding instinct. The awakening of fear as distinct from mere pity depends on the close identification of the hero and ourselves.

In Ed. 2 I inclined to the view that the φόβος of tragedy, like the φόβος of real life, is primarily fear for ourselves. On that assumption περὶ must bear a different sense in the two clauses: 'we feel pity for τὸν ἀνάξιον: we feel fear in connexion with τὸν ὅμοιον,' i.e. his sufferings awaken a fear for ourselves who share his humanity. The change of meaning is undeniably harsh, though certain considerations were offered which mitigate the difficulty.

Some distinguished scholars have explained the difference between tragic fear and pity otherwise. Tragic fear, they maintain, is the fear felt for the hero while the misfortune is still impending; pity, on the other hand, is awakened by events in the present or the past. The reasons against reducing the difference merely to one of time are:—

(1) Fear in Aristotle is not distinguished from pity by a reference to future time. In Rhet. ii. 5. 1382 b 26, quoted p. 256 note 4, μέλλοντα shows that we may pity a man for what is about to happen. Cf. also Rhet. ii. 8. 1386 a 34, ἢ ὡς μέλλον ἢ ὡς γεγονός.

(2) If pity and fear in tragedy are only two sides of the same feeling, why distinguish them as sharply as is done in Poet. xi. 4 (ἢ ἔλεον ἢ φόβον): xiv. 3 (ποῖα οὖν δεινὰ ἢ ποῖα οἰκτρὰ φαίνεται;)?

The tragic sufferer is a man like ourselves (ὁμοίος);<sup>1</sup> and on this inner likeness the effect of tragedy, as described in the Poetics, mainly hinges. Without it our complete sympathy would not be enlisted. The resemblance on which Aristotle insists is one of moral character. His hero (Poet. ch. xiii) is not a man of flawless perfection, nor yet one of consummate villainy; by which we must not understand that he has merely average or mediocre qualities. He rises, indeed, above the common level in moral elevation and dignity, but he is not free from frailties and imperfections.<sup>2</sup> His must be a rich and full humanity, composed of elements which other men possess, but blended more harmoniously or of more potent quality. So much human nature must there be in him that we are able in

And why again insist, as Aristotle does, on the combined effect? In any play with a tragic ending, in which the incidents work up towards a catastrophe, pity at the event implies, on this theory, a preceding fear: the separate mention of fear might be dispensed with.

(3) Pity, says Aristotle, is περὶ τὸν ἀνάξιον, fear περὶ τὸν ὁμοίον. But why should the mere distinction of time make a distinction of character necessary? Why, that is, must the hero be ἀνάξιος if we are to feel for him in present misfortune, but ὁμοίος if we are to feel for him under impending calamity?

<sup>1</sup> In Poet. xiii. 2 (see last note) φόβος is περὶ τὸν ὁμοίον, while ἔλεος is περὶ τὸν ἀνάξιον. In Rhet. ii. 8. 1386 a 24, τοῖς ὁμοίοις ἐλεοῦσιν κατὰ ἡλικίαν, κατὰ ἡθῆν, κατὰ ἔξεις, κατὰ ἀξιώματα, κατὰ γένῃ, the reason being added that such similarity of conditions suggests fear for ourselves. It may be noted that the 'likeness' of the Rhetoric includes various external forms of resemblance which are outside the scope of Poet. xiii

some sense to identify ourselves with him, to make his misfortunes our own. At the same time he is raised above us in external dignity and station. He is a prince or famous man who falls from a height of greatness. Apart from the impressive effect of the contrast so presented, there is a gain in the hero being placed at an ideal distance from the spectator. We are not confronted with outward conditions of life too like our own. The pressure of immediate reality is removed; we are not painfully reminded of the cares of our own material existence. We have here part of the refining process which the tragic emotions undergo within the region of art. They are disengaged from the petty interests of self, and are on the way to being universalised.

The tragic fear, though modified in passing under the conditions of art, is not any languid emotion. It differs, indeed, from the crushing apprehension of personal disaster. In reading or witnessing the Oedipus Tyrannus we are not possessed with a fear that we may be placed in circumstances similar to those of Oedipus, or be overtaken by the same calamities.<sup>1</sup> Yet a thrill runs through us, a shudder of horror or of vague foreboding.<sup>1</sup> The feeling is immediate and unreflective. The tension of mind, the agonised expectation with which we await the impending catastrophe, springs from our sympathy with the hero in whose existence we have for the time merged our own.<sup>2</sup> The events as they pass before us seem almost as if we were directly concerned. We are brought into a mood in which we feel that we too are liable to suffering.<sup>3</sup> Yet the object of dread is not a definite evil threatening us at close quarters. In the spectacle of another's errors or misfortunes, in the shocks and blows of circumstance, we read the 'doubtful doom of human kind.' The vividness with which the imagination pictures unrealised calamity produces the same intensity of impression as if the danger were at hand.<sup>4</sup> The true tragic fear becomes an almost impersonal emotion, attaching itself not so much to this or that particular incident, as to the general course of the action, which is for us an image of human destiny. We are thrilled with awe at the greatness of the issues thus unfolded, and with the moral inevitableness of the result. In this sense of awe the emotions of fear and pity are blended.

We can now see that the essential tragic effect depends on maintaining the intimate alliance between pity and fear. According to Aristotle, not pity alone should be evoked by tragedy, as many moderns have held;<sup>1</sup> not pity or fear, for which Corneille argued;<sup>2</sup> not pity and 'admiration,' which is the modification under which the Aristotelian μέλλον ἢ ὡς γεγονός. (For τοὺς συνυπ. σχήμ. cf. Poet. xvii. 1.) It may be remarked that there is no allusion in the Rhetoric to φόβος as awakened in the drama.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. Schiller in his essay On Tragic Art. Elsewhere in his letters and other writings he sometimes speaks of fear as well as pity; but his fear is not the Aristotelian fear; it is merely the apprehension felt while the terrible event is still in the future, a fear which becomes pity after the event.

In ancient tragedy fear was a powerful and necessary factor. In modern tragedy—with the exception of Shakespeare—pity predominates over fear. In the eighteenth century fear was almost entirely eliminated.

phrase finds currency in the Elizabethan writers.<sup>1</sup> The requirement of Aristotle is pity and fear.<sup>2</sup> He would no doubt allow that in some tragedies the primary and predominant impression is fear, in others pity. He would probably go farther and say that an inferior tragedy may excite one only of the two emotions generally called tragic.<sup>3</sup> But the full tragic effect requires the union of the two, nor can

In the phrase of the anonymous fragment, 'On Comedy,'<sup>1</sup> which appears to contain some genuine Aristotelian tradition, 'tragedy seeks to blend fear with pity in due proportion' (ἡ τραγωδία συμμετρῶν θέλει ἔχειν τοῦ φόβου). Pity, as Bernays explains, through its kinship with fear, is preserved from eccentricity and sentimentalism. Fear, through its alliance with pity, is divested of a narrow selfishness, of the vulgar terror which is inspired by personal danger.<sup>2</sup> A self-absorbed anxiety or alarm makes us incapable of sympathy with others. In this sense 'fear casts out pity.'<sup>3</sup> Tragic fear, though it may send an inward shudder through the blood, does not paralyse the mind or stun the sense, as does the direct vision of some impending calamity. And the reason is that this fear, unlike the fear of common reality, is based on an imaginative union with another's life. The spectator is lifted out of himself. He becomes one with the tragic sufferer, and through him with humanity at large. One effect of the drama, said Plato, is that through it a man becomes many, instead of one; it makes him lose his proper personality in a pantomimic instinct, and so prove false to himself. Aristotle might reply. True; he passes out of himself, but it is through the enlarging power of sympathy. He forgets his own petty sufferings. He quits the narrow sphere of the individual. He identifies himself with the fate of mankind.

<sup>2</sup> Voltaire quotes with approval the observation of Saint-Evremond that in French tragedy tenderness takes the place of pity and surprise the place of fear. 'It cannot be denied,' he says, 'that Saint-Evremond has put his finger on the secret sore of the French theatre.' The idea of fear, again, was frequently that of mere terror. Thus in France in the seventeenth century the conception of the tragic had come to be the union of the sentimental and the horrible.

We are here brought back to Aristotle's theory of poetry as a representation of the universal. Tragedy exemplifies with concentrated power this highest function of the poetic art. The characters it depicts, the actions and fortunes of the persons with whom it acquaints us, possess a typical and universal value. The artistic unity of plot, binding together the several parts of the play in close inward coherence, reveals the law of human destiny, the causes and effects of suffering. The incidents which thrill us are intensified in their effect, when to the shock of surprise is added the discovery that each thing as it has happened could not be otherwise; it stands in organic relation to what has gone before. There is a combination of the inevitable and the unexpected.<sup>1</sup> Pity and fear awakened in connexion with these larger aspects of human suffering, and kept in close alliance with one another, become universalised emotions. What is purely personal and self-regarding drops away. The spectator who is brought face to face with grander sufferings than his own experiences a sympathetic ecstasy, or lifting out of himself. It is precisely in this transport of feeling, which carries a man beyond his individual self, that the distinctive tragic pleasure resides. Pity and fear are purged of the impure element which clings to them in life. In the glow of tragic excitement these feelings are so transformed that the net result is a noble emotional satisfaction.

The katharsis, viewed as a refining process, may have primarily implied no more to Aristotle than the expulsion of the disturbing element, namely, the pain,<sup>2</sup> which enters into pity and fear when aroused by real objects. The mere fact of such an expulsion would have supplied him with a point of argument against Plato, in addition to the main line of reply above indicated.<sup>1</sup> In the Philebus Plato had described the mixed (μυχθείσαι) or impure (ἀκάθαρτοι) pleasures as those which have in them an alloy of pain; and the pleasure of tragedy was stated to be of the mixed order.<sup>2</sup> The Aristotelian theory asserts that the emotions on which tragedy works do indeed in real life contain a large admixture of pain, but that by artistic treatment the painful element is expelled or overpowered.

In the foregoing pages, however, we have carried the analysis a step farther, and shown how and why the pain gives way to pleasure. The sting of the pain, the disquiet and unrest, arise from the selfish element which in the world of reality clings to these emotions. The pain is expelled when the taint of egoism is removed. If it is objected that the notion of universalising the emotions and ridding them of an intrusive element that belongs to the sphere of the accidental and individual, is a modern conception, which we have no warrant for attributing to Aristotle, we may reply that if this is not what Aristotle meant, it is at least the

Let us assume, then, that the tragic katharsis involves not only the idea of an emotional relief, but the further idea of the purifying of the emotions so relieved. In accepting this interpretation we do not ascribe to tragedy a direct moral purpose and influence. Tragedy, according to the definition, acts on the feelings, not on the will. It does not make men better, though it removes certain hindrances to virtue. The refining of passion under temporary and artificial excitement is still far distant from moral improvement. Aristotle would probably admit that indirectly the drama has a moral influence in enabling the emotional system to throw off some perilous stuff, certain elements of feeling, which, if left to themselves, might develop dangerous energy, and impede the free play of those vital functions on which the exercise of virtue depends. The excitation of noble emotions will probably in time exert an effect upon the will. But whatever may be the indirect effect of the repeated operation of the katharsis, we may confidently say that Aristotle in his definition of tragedy is thinking, not of any such remote result, but of the immediate end of the art, of the aesthetic function it fulfils.

It is only under certain conditions of art that the homoeopathic cure of pity and fear by similar emotions is possible. Fear cannot be combined with the proper measure of pity, unless the subject matter admits of being universalised. The dramatic action must be so significant, and its meaning capable of such extension, that through it we can discern the higher laws which rule the world. The private life of an individual, tragic as it may be in its inner quality, has never been made the subject of the highest tragedy. Its consequences are not of far-reaching importance; it does not move the imagination with sufficient power. Within the limited circle of a bourgeois society, a great action is hardly capable of being unfolded. A parochial drama, like that of Ibsen, where the hero struggles against the cramping conditions of his normal life, sometimes with all the ardour of aspiring hope, more often in the spirit of egoistic self-assertion which mistakes the measure of the individual's powers, can hardly rise to tragic dignity. We are conscious of a too narrow stage, of a confined outlook, and of squalid motives underlying even conduct which is invested with a certain air of grandeur. The play moves on the flat levels of existence. The characters are unequal to the task imposed on them; and though we may find room for human pity in witnessing failure and foiled hopes, still it is commonplace and gloomy failure. No one can question the skill in dramatic construction and the stirring interest of Ibsen's plays, but the depressing sense of the trivial cannot be shaken off, and the action always retains traces of an inherent littleness, which hinders the awakening of tragic fear,—still more of that solemnity and awe which is the final feeling left by genuine tragedy. Some quality of greatness in the situation as well as in the characters appears to be all but indispensable, if we are to be raised above the individual suffering, and experience a calming, instead of a disquieting feeling at the close. The tragic katharsis requires that suffering shall be exhibited in one of its comprehensive aspects; that the deeds and fortunes of the actors shall attach themselves to larger issues, and the spectator himself be lifted above the special case, and brought face to face with universal law and the divine plan of the world.

In order that an emotion may be not only excited but also allayed,—that the tumult of the mind may be resolved into a pleasurable calm,—the emotion, stirred by a fictitious representation, must divest itself of its purely selfish and material elements, and become part of a new order of things. It is perhaps for this reason that love in itself is hardly a tragic motive. The more exclusive and self-absorbed a passion is, the more does it resist kathartīc treatment. The feelings excited must have their basis in the permanent and objective realities of life, and be independent of individual caprice or sentiment. In the ordinary novel the passion of love in its egoistic and self-centred interest does not admit of being generalised, or its story enlarged into a typical and independent action. The rare cases where a love story is truly tragic go to prove the point which is here enforced. In Romeo and Juliet the tragedy does not lie merely in the unhappy ending of a tale of true love. Certain other conditions, beyond those which contribute to give a dramatic interest, are required to produce the tragic effect. There is the feud of the two houses, whose high place in the commonwealth makes their enmity an affair of public concern. The lovers in their new-found rapture act in defiance of all external obligations. The elemental force and depth of their passion bring them into collision with the fabric of the society to which they belong. Their tragic doom quickly closes in upon them. Yet even in death the consequences of their act extend beyond the sphere of the individual. Over the grave of their love the two houses are reconciled.

Tragedy, as it has been here explained, satisfies a universal human need. The fear and pity on and through which it operates are not, as some have maintained, rare and abnormal emotions. All men, as Aristotle says,<sup>1</sup> are susceptible to them, some persons in an overpowering measure. For the modern, as for the ancient world, they are still among the primary instincts; always present, if below the surface, and ready to be called into activity.<sup>1</sup> The Greeks, from temperament, circumstances, and religious beliefs, may have been more sensitive to their influence than we are, and more likely to suffer from them in a morbid form. Greek tragedy, indeed, in its beginnings was but a wild religious excitement, a bacchic ecstasy. This aimless ecstasy was brought under artistic law. It was ennobled by objects worthy of an ideal emotion. The poets found out how the transport of human pity and human fear might, under the excitation of art, be dissolved in joy, and the pain escape in the purified tide of human sympathy.

THE DRAMATIC UNITIES

‘UNITY of plot does not,’ says Aristotle,<sup>1</sup> ‘as some persons think, consist in the unity of the hero. For infinitely various are the incidents in one man’s life, which cannot be reduced to unity; and so, too, there are many actions of one man out of which we cannot make one action. Hence the error, as it appears, of all poets who have composed a Heracleid, a Theseid, or other poems of the kind. They imagine that as Heracles was one man, the story of Heracles must also be a unity.’ Such is the principle laid down for tragedy in ch. viii., and Homer is there held up as the true model even to the tragedian. Precisely the same principle is affirmed of epic poetry in ch. xxiii., where it is added that unity of time, like unity of person, does not of itself bind events into a unity.<sup>2</sup> Not only epics like the Achilleid of Statius offend against this fundamental principle, but also many modern dramas in which the life and character of the hero become

The first requirement of a tragedy is Unity of Action.<sup>1</sup> Unity in Aristotle is the principle of limit, without which an object loses itself in the ἄπειρον, the region of the undefined, the indeterminate, the accidental. By means of unity the plot becomes individual and also intelligible. The greater the unity, the more perfect will it be as a concrete and individual thing; at the same time it will gain in universality and typical quality.<sup>2</sup>

The Unity of the tragic action is, again, an organic unity, an inward principle which reveals itself in the form of an outward whole.<sup>3</sup> It is opposed indeed to plurality, but not opposed to the idea of manifoldness and variety; for simple as it is in one sense, it admits of all the complexity of vital phenomena. The whole (ὅλον) in which it is manifested is complete (τέλειον)<sup>4</sup> in its parts, the

<sup>4</sup> In the definition of tragedy (Poet. vi. 2) we have τελείας πράξεως, in vii. 2 τελείας καὶ ὅλης πράξεως. So in xiiii. 1 epic parts themselves being arranged in a fixed order (τάξις),<sup>1</sup> and structurally related so that none can be removed, none transposed, without disturbing the organism.<sup>2</sup> Within the single and complete action which constitutes the unity of a tragedy, the successive incidents are connected together by an inward and causal bond,—by the law of necessary and probable sequence, on which Aristotle is never tired of insisting.

Again, a certain magnitude (μέγεθος) is indispensable for the harmonious evolution of a whole such as is here described. This is frequently affirmed by Aristotle. As a biological law it applies to the healthy life and growth of all organic structures.<sup>3</sup> It is also an artistic law, poetry is περὶ μίαν πρῶξιν ὅλην καὶ τελείαν. A perfect ὅλον is necessarily τέλειον. In Phys. iii. 6. 207 a 7 sqq. ὅλον and τέλειον are opposed to ἄπειρον, and the two words declared to be almost equivalent in meaning: ἄπειρον μὲν οὖν ἐστὶν οὐ κατὰ ποσὸν λαμβάνουσιν αἰεὶ τι λαβεῖν ἔστιν ἔξω. οὐ δὲ μηδὲν ἔξω, τοῦτ' ἐστὶ τέλειον καὶ ὅλον· οὕτω γὰρ ὀριζόμεθα τὸ ὅλον, οὐ μηθὲν ἄπειρον, οἷον ἄνθρωπον ὅλον ἢ κιβωτόν: ib. 13, ὅλον δὲ καὶ τέλειον ἢ τὸ αὐτὸ πάμπαν ἢ σύνεγγυς τὴν φύσιν ἐστίν. <sup>1</sup> Cf. Plat. Gorg. 503 E, (every craftsman and artist) εἰς τάξιν τινὰ ἕκαστος ἕκαστον τίθησιν ὃ ἂν τιθῇ, καὶ προσαναγκάζει τὸ ἕτερον τῷ ἑτέρῳ πρέπον τε εἶναι καὶ ἀρμόττειν, ἕως ἂν τὸ ἅπαν σύστημα τεταγμένον τε καὶ κεκοσμημένον πρᾶγμα.

expressing one of the first conditions of organic beauty.<sup>1</sup> In this latter sense it is emphasised in chapter vii. of the Poetics. An object is unfit for artistic representation if it is infinitely large or infinitesimally small.<sup>2</sup> On this principle a whole such as the Trojan war, 'though it has a beginning and an end,' is too vast in its compass even for epic treatment; it cannot be grasped by the mind, and incurs the risk attaching to any πολυμερὴς πρᾶξις, of becoming a series of detached scenes or incidents.<sup>3</sup>

Aristotle wisely avoids attempting to lay down any very precise rules as to the possible length to which a play may be extended. What he does say on the subject is marked by much sobriety and good sense. He rejects as inartistic any reference to the outward and accidental conditions of stage representation.<sup>4</sup> He falls back on the law of beauty as

ii. 6. 745 a 5, ἔστι γάρ τι πᾶσι τοῖς ζῴοις πέρασ τοῦ μεγέθους. The same principle applies to α πόλις, Pol. iv. governing a work of art, and—intimately related to this—on men's normal powers of memory and enjoyment. The whole, he says, must be of such dimensions that the memory or mind's eye can embrace and retain it.<sup>1</sup> The more truly artistic principle, however, is that which is stated in ch. vii. 7. A play should be of a magnitude sufficient to allow room for the natural development of the story. The action must evolve itself freely and fully, and the decisive change of fortune come about through the causal sequence of events.<sup>2</sup>

This rule holds good of the two varieties of plot that are afterwards distinguished,—of the ἀπλή πρᾶξις, where the action proceeds on a simple and undeviating course from start to finish; and of the πεπλεγμένη πρᾶξις—preferred by Aristotle as intensifying the tragic emotions—where the catastrophe is worked out by the surprises of Recognition (ἀναγνώρισις) and Reversal of Intention (περιπέτεια);<sup>3</sup> these surprises, however, being themselves woven into the tissue of the plot,<sup>4</sup> and discovered in the light of the event to be the inevitable, though unexpected, consequences of all that has preceded.<sup>1</sup> The λύσις, the unravelling or Dénouement of the plot, must, as we are told, in every case 'arise out of the plot itself,'<sup>2</sup> not by recourse to the Deus ex Machina or to the play of accident—a warning the need of which is proved by the whole history of the stage. 'What did she die of?' was asked concerning one of the characters in a bad tragedy; 'Of what? of the fifth act,' was the reply. Lessing, who tells the story, adds<sup>3</sup> that 'in very truth the fifth act is an ugly evil disease that carries off many a one to whom the first four acts promised a longer life.'

Let us now look a little more closely into Aristotle's conception of a 'whole,' as the term is applied to the tragic action.

'A whole,' he says, 'is that which has a beginning, a middle, and an end'; and each of these terms is then defined. 'A beginning is that which does not itself follow anything by causal necessity, μύθου, . . . διαφέρει γὰρ πολὺν τὸ γίγνεσθαι τάδε διὰ τάδε ἢ μετὰ τάδε.

but after which something naturally is or comes to be. An end, on the contrary, is that which itself naturally follows some other thing, either by necessity, or as a rule, but has nothing following it. A middle is that which follows something as some other thing follows it.<sup>1</sup> Some difficulties have been felt with respect to these definitions. How, it is said, can a beginning be causally unconnected with what precedes? Do the opening scenes of a tragedy stand apart from the rest of the hero's career? Is nothing implied as to his previous history?

The answer would appear to be of this kind. The beginning of a drama is, no doubt, the natural sequel of something else. Still it must not carry us back in thought to all that has gone before. Antecedent events do not thrust themselves on us in an unending series. Certain facts are necessarily given. We do not trace each of these facts back to its origin, or follow the chain of cause and effect ad infinitum.<sup>1</sup> If we did, the drama would become an endless retrograde movement. A play must begin at some definite point, and at some definite point it must end. It is for the poet to see that the action is complete in itself, and that neither the beginning nor the end is arbitrarily chosen. Within the dramatic action, a strict sequence of cause and effect is prescribed; but the causal chain must not be indefinitely extended outwards.

The definition of the 'middle' as 'that which follows something as some other thing follows it,' looks at first sight mere tautology: but the context shows that the word 'follows' here marks a causal, not a purely temporal sequence. The idea is that

He adds, however, that the reason Aristotle insists on this relative beginning is that tragedy is within the sphere of freedom: it must be begun by an act of free will. It seems most unlikely that anything of the sort is in Aristotle's mind. On the other hand, it is true that the Greek tragedians do generally make the action begin at a point where the human will has free play. This is a striking feature in Sophocles' treatment of the legends. Dark or superhuman forces may be at work in the antecedents of the play, but within the tragedy there is human will in action. The Ajax, the Philoctetes, the Oedipus Tyrannus, and the Oedipus Coloneus are examples.

the 'middle' unlike the 'beginning' stands in causal relation to what goes before, and unlike the 'end' is causally connected with what follows. There is no attempt to mark at what point in the development of the play the 'middle' is to be placed. The purpose of the definitions is to exclude beginnings which require something to precede them, endings which do not conclude the action, and middles which stand alone, unconnected either with the beginning or the end. We have here an emphatic condemnation of that kind of plot which Aristotle calls 'eepisodic' (ἐπεισοδιώδης), where the scenes follow one another without the inward connexion of the εἰκός or ἀναγκαῖον.<sup>1</sup> A succession of stirring scenes does not make a tragedy; and it is just this truth that Euripides is apt to forget when, instead of creating a well-articulated whole, he often delights to substitute pathetic effects, striking situations, rapid contrasts and surprises.

These definitions, however, like so many in the Poetics, have reference to the ideal tragedy; they are not to be taken as a rule to which all Greek plays conform. This will account for the inconsistency between the account here given of the 'beginning,' and the account in ch. xviii. of the Complication (δέσις) and Dénouement (λύσις) of the tragic plot. The Complication is that group of events which precedes the decisive turn of fortune; the Dénouement is that group of events which follows it. In strictness, and according to the definition of ch. vii., the 'beginning' of the play should be also the 'beginning' of the Complication. But the Complication, according to ch. xviii., frequently includes τὰ ἔξωθεν,<sup>1</sup>—certain incidents external to the action proper, but presupposed in the drama, and affecting the development of the piece. With plays before him like the Oedipus Tyrannus and the Ajax, Aristotle even at the cost of some inconsistency admits such external incidents to form part of the dramatic entanglement. It is in some measure owing to this practice of the Greek theatre that an ancient tragedy often resembles the concluding acts of a modern play. It begins almost at the climax: the action proper is highly compressed and concentrated, and forms the last moment of a larger action hastening to its close.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Dryden, Essay of Dramatic Poesy, 'The Ancients . . . set the audience, as it were, at the post where the race is to be concluded; and, saving them the tedious expectation of seeing the poet set out and ride the beginning of the course, you behold him not till he is in sight of the goal, and just upon you.'

of tragedy, are in themselves liable to mislead the reader, the rules of chapters vii. and viii. ought to correct any erroneous impression that may arise. The thought that here stands out above all others is that of the organic structure of the drama. Further, it becomes apparent that the recurring phrase of the Poetics, σύστασις (or σύνθεσις) τῶν πραγμάτων, does not denote a mechanical piecing together of incidents, but a vital union of the parts.<sup>1</sup> But, it may be asked, how is the organic unity revealed? From what point of view can we most clearly realise it?

If we have rightly apprehended the general tenor of Aristotle's teaching in the Poetics, unity—he would say—is manifested mainly in two ways. First, in the causal connexion that binds together the several parts of a play,—the thoughts, the emotions, the decisions of the will, the external events being inextricably interwoven. Secondly, in the fact that the whole series of events, with all the moral forces that are brought into collision, are directed to a single end. The action as it advances converges on a definite point. The thread of purpose running through it becomes more marked. All minor effects are subordinated to the sense of an ever-growing unity. The end is linked to the beginning with inevitable certainty, and in the end we discern the meaning of the

Aristotle's conception of the unity of plan essential to the drama could not be much better summed up than in the following extract from Lowell:<sup>2</sup>—'In a play we not only expect a succession of scenes, but that each scene should lead, by a logic more or less stringent, if not to the next, at any rate to something that is to follow, and that all should contribute their fraction of impulse towards the inevitable catastrophe. That is to say, the structure should be organic, with a necessary and harmonious connexion and relation of parts, and not merely mechanical, with an arbitrary or haphazard joining of one part to another. It is in the former sense alone that any production can be called a work of art.'

The general law of unity laid down in the Poetics for an epic poem is almost the same as for the drama;<sup>3</sup> but the drama forms a more compact and serried whole. Its events are in more direct relation with the development of character; its incidents are never incidents and nothing more. The sequence of the parts is more inevitable—morally more inevitable—than in a story where the external facts and events have an independent value of their own. And though the modern drama, unlike the ancient, aspires to a certain epic fulness of treatment, it cannot violate the determining conditions of dramatic form.

The epic, being of wider compass, can admit many episodes, which serve to fill in the pauses of the action, or diversify the interest.<sup>1</sup> They give what Aristotle calls ποικιλία,<sup>2</sup> embellishment and variety to the narrative. The epic moreover advances slowly, and introduces 'retarding' incidents,—incidents by which the Dénouement is delayed, and the mental strain for the time relieved, only to be intensified again when the climax comes. Further, owing to the number of its minor actions, the epic, while keeping its essential unity, contains the plots of many tragedies; in the phrase of Aristotle, it is πολύμυθος:<sup>3</sup> whereas the drama rejects this multiplicity of incidents; it is of closer tissue, pressing forward to an end which controls its entire structure. By the very conditions also of dramatic representation a play cannot, except through the mouth of messengers or by similar means, place before us other than successive events. The epic, by virtue of its narrative form, can describe actions that are simultaneous.<sup>1</sup> Thus the Odyssey, after a long interval, resumes the main story, which had been left in suspense; simultaneous and collateral incidents are narrated with much fulness of detail, and the scattered threads bound together in the unity of a single and accelerating action.

The action, then, of the drama is concentrated, while that of the epic is large and manifold. The primary difference of form is here a governing fact in the development of the two varieties of poetry. The epic is a story of the past, the drama a representation in the present. The epic storyteller can take his time; his imagination travels backward to a remote distance, and there expatiates at will. He surveys the events of a past, which is already a closed book. If he happens to be the rhapsodist of an early society, he and his audience alike have time immeasurable at their command, he to tell, and they to listen. 'Behold,' says King Alcinous in the Odyssey, 'the night is of great length unspeakable, and the time for sleep in the hall is not yet; tell me therefore of those wondrous deeds. I could abide even till the bright dawn, so long as thou couldst endure to rehearse me these woes of thine in the hall.' <sup>1</sup> That is the true temper of the epic audience. They will listen through the night, and next day desire to take up the tale again.

The conditions of the drama are the opposite of all this. The spectacle of an action evolving itself in the present is very different from the leisurely recital of an event that has happened in the past. The impressions are more vivid in proportion to their nearness. Nay, so vivid do they become that the spectator, living in the present, becomes almost one with the hero whose fortunes he follows. He is impatient to see the sequel: he cannot listen to long stories, to adventures unconnected with that in which the central interest lies. The action which rivets his attention is hastening towards its goal. By the very fact that the dramatic struggle and catastrophe take place before his eyes, the action gains a rapidity, partly dramatic, partly lyric, that is alien to the epic poem.

The only dramatic Unity enjoined by Aristotle is Unity of Action. It is strange that this should still need to be repeated. So inveterate, however, is a literary tradition, once it has been established under the sanction of high authority, that we still find the 'Three Unities' spoken of in popular writings as a rule of the Poetics.

It may be interesting here to cast a rapid glance over the history of this famous literary superstition.<sup>1</sup>

Teichmüller (Arist. Forsch. pp. 206 ff.) attempts to show not only that μήκος here is the external length of the poem, but also that χρόνος is the actual time taken in recitation (or representation), as distinct from the ideal or imaginary time over which the action extends. He seems to prove his case with respect to μήκος, which invariably in the Poetics means external length. But his view of χρόνος is open apparently to fatal objections, the chief of which are these:—(1) μίαν περίοδον ἡλίον can hardly express the day of twelve hours. The word περίοδος as applied to a heavenly body always means its full orbit, its motion from a given starting-point back again to the same point. This periphrasis, instead of the simple phrase μίαν ἡμέραν, seems expressly designed to indicate that the day of twenty-four hours—ἡμέρα together with νύξ—is meant. (2) As has been shown by Ribbeck, Rhein. Mus. 24, p. 133, the parenthetical remark, τὸ πρῶτον ὁμοίως ἐν ταῖς τραγωδίαις τοῦτο ἐποιοῦν καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἔπεισιν, tells strongly against Teichmüller. The reference must be to the imaginary time of the action in the play itself. (3) τραγωδία throughout the Poetics is used for tragedy as a distinct species of poetry, or for a particular tragedy,—never for the tragic performance including a tetralogy. (4) μάλιστα περᾶται loses almost all point if the χρόνος is external time, and 'Epic poetry and tragedy differ, again, in their length: for tragedy endeavours, as far as possible, to confine itself to a single revolution of the sun, or but slightly to exceed this limit; whereas the epic action has no limits of time.' We have here a rough generalisation as to the practice of the Greek stage. The imaginary time of the dramatic action is limited, as far as may be, to the day of twenty-four hours. The practice, however, did not always exist. In the earlier days of tragedy, as the next sentence shows, the time-limit was ignored in the tragic no less than in the epic action.

No strict rule is here laid down. A certain historic fact is recorded,—a prevailing, but not an invariable usage. The effort of tragedy was in this direction, though the result could not always be achieved. Even in the developed Attic drama several exceptions to the practice are to be found.

if ὑπὸ μίαν . . . εἶναι instead of its natural sense 'fall within,' 'be comprised within,' is forced to mean 'occupy,' or 'fill up.' twelve hours of daylight.

The translation adopted in the text follows Ueberweg's explanation. μῆκος is (with Teichmüller) referred to the actual length of the poem, but χρόνος to the internal time of the action. The difference in the length of a poem is made to depend on a difference in the time occupied by the action. Roughly speaking, such a relation generally exists, at least in the drama. But it is far from being a strict rule.

In forming this conclusion on a passage which is still not without difficulty, I have had the advantage of some correspondence with Prof. Bywater.

In the Eumenides months or years elapse between the opening of the play and the next scene. The Trachiniae of Sophocles and the Supplices of Euripides afford other and striking instances of the violation of the so-called rule. In the Agamemnon, even if a definite interval of days cannot be assumed between the fire-signals announcing the fall of Troy, and the return of Agamemnon, at any rate the conditions of time are disregarded and the march of events is imaginatively accelerated.<sup>1</sup>

As for the 'Unity of Place,' this too was a stage-practice, generally observed in the Greek drama but sometimes neglected, more especially in comedy: it is nowhere even hinted at in the Poetics, and, as a rule of art, has been deduced by the critics from the Unity of Time.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> On the time-question in the Agamemnon see an article by Prof. Lewis Campbell in the Classical Review, vol. iv. 303-5. On the general question of 'The Unity of Time' see Verrall, Ion of Eurip. Intr. pp. xlviii ff. (Cambridge Press).

<sup>2</sup> The formal recognition of the Unity of Place as a third Unity dates from Castelvetro's first edition of the Poetics in 1570: see an article by H. Bretinger in Revue Critique 1879, ii. pp. 478-80. In the same article two other points are noted: (1) that Castelvetro adopts the theory put forward in the Poetik published 1561 from the remains of J. C. Scaliger, identifying the time of the action with that of the representation; (2) that Sir Philip Sidney in his Apologie for Poetrie, written soon after 1580 and published in 1595, derived from Castelvetro many of the arguments and examples by which he maintains his vigorous defence of the Three Unities.

See also Spingarn p. 99, 'In fact, Castelvetro specifically says

There are several very obvious reasons for the general observance of the minor Unities in Greek tragedy. The simple and highly concentrated movement of a Greek play seldom demanded, or even permitted, a change of place or intervals between the scenes. Such breaks would, as a rule, have been liable to disturb the impression of the unity of the whole. Moreover, as has been often remarked, the Chorus formed an ideal bond of union between the separate parts of the action. Lessing suggests<sup>1</sup> that the limitations of time and place were necessary in order that the Chorus might not seem to be kept too long away from their homes. But if once we realise the painful fact that these worthy men are kept standing, it may be for twenty-four hours, fasting and in one place, our distress will not be perceptibly augmented if the action is prolonged to thirty-six or forty-eight hours. Still, it is true that the constant presence of the same group of actors in a theatre where there was no drop-scene, no division into Acts, did naturally lead to the representation of a continuous and unbroken action.

From this point of view the presence of the Chorus tended towards Unity of Place and Unity of Time. From another point of view the Chorus that the unity of action is not essential to the drama, but is merely made expedient by the requirements of time and place.'

releases us from the captivity of time. The interval covered by a choral ode is one whose value is just what the poet chooses to make it. While the time occupied by the dialogue has a relation more or less exact to real time, the choral lyrics suspend the outward action of the play, and carry us still farther away from the world of reality. What happens in the interval cannot be measured by any ordinary reckoning; it is much or little as the needs of the piece demand. A change of placé directly obtrudes itself on the senses, but time is only what it appears to the mind. The imagination travels easily over many hours; and in the Greek drama the time that elapses during the songs of the Chorus is entirely idealised.

In interpreting the passage of the Poetics above quoted (ch. v. 4), the earlier critics dealt very loosely with the Greek. πειράται ἡ τραγῳδία, says Aristotle. Corneille and d'Aubignac translate πειράται by doit, and thereby convert the general statement of fact at once into a rule. Successive commentators repeated the error. But the stress of the controversy gathered round another point. What is the meaning of the phrase μίαν περίοδον ἡλίου, 'a single revolution of the sun'?<sup>1</sup> Is it the day of twenty-four hours or the day of twelve hours? The Italian critics were divided on this question ; so too were the French. Corneille<sup>1</sup> declared in favour of twenty-four hours ; but proposed, by a stretch of the rule, to allow thirty hours ; and even this limit he thought hampering. He wavers curiously between the true poetic view as to the ideal management of time, and the principle of poetic illusion—or rather deception—so widely held by his contemporaries, that the more exact the reproduction of the conditions of reality, the better the art.

At one moment he says that, if the representation lasts two hours, the dramatic action ought to be the same length, that the resemblance may be perfect. If, however, the action cannot with due regard to probability be compressed into two hours, he would allow it to run to four or six or ten hours, but not much beyond the twenty-four. Might it not have occurred to him that long before the extreme limit of twenty-four or thirty hours was reached, the principle of a life-like imitation of reality would have been surrendered ? No sooner, however, has he enunciated the rule than his instincts as a poet get the upper hand, and he writes : ‘Above all I would leave the length of the action to the imagination of the hearers, and never determine the time, if the subject does not require it. . . . What need is there to mark at the opening

Dacier<sup>1</sup> disputes the view that the 'single revolution of the sun' means a day of twenty-four hours. He holds it to be monstrous and against common sense ; 'it would ruin the verisimilitude.' He fixes twelve hours as the extreme limit of the dramatic action, but these may be either in the night or in the day, or half in one and half in the other.<sup>2</sup> In the perfect tragedy—and here he agrees with Corneille—the time of the action and of the representation should coincide. He roundly asserts that this was an indispensable law of Greek tragedy,<sup>3</sup> though this statement is afterwards qualified. If, owing to the nature of the subject, the poet cannot observe the rule of strict equivalence, he may have recourse to 'verisimilitude' ; and this is stated to be the Aristotelian principle : 'Aristotle supplied the defect of necessity by probability.'<sup>4</sup> Thus the law of the εἰκός and

<sup>4</sup> Dacier on Poetics, ch. vii. note 18. Here the ἀναγκαῖον of Aristotle becomes the exact equivalence of the time of the action with the time of the representation : the εἰκός becomes the verisimilitude which in default of such equivalence 'will cheat the audience, who will not pry so narrowly as to mind what is behind the scenes, provided there be nothing too extravagant.'

ἀνὰ καὶ in the Poetics degenerates into a device which may lead the audience to imagine that the scene on the stage is a facsimile of real life. The fallacious principle that the dramatic imitation is meant to be in some sense a deception,<sup>1</sup> is at the basis of all these strange reasonings as to the possible equivalence between real and imaginary time. The idea exists in Corneille.<sup>2</sup> It is pushed to its extreme by Dacier and Batteux. Even Voltaire commits himself to the absurd position that 'if the poet represents a conspiracy and makes the action to last fourteen days, he must account to me for all that takes place in those fourteen days.'<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> So Dacier on Poetics, ch. xviii. note 3: 'Mr. Corneille is satisfied that the audience should know why the actors go out of the place where the scene is laid ; but he does not think it necessary to know what they do during the intervals, neither that 'tis required that the actors should do anything during the intervals, but is persuaded that they may sleep then, if they please, and not break the continuity of the action. We find just the contrary according to Aristotle's principles, and that it ceases to be a tragedy when 'tis so, for this would certainly ruin all the probability, if the audience did not know what the actors were doing during the intervals ; and if the actors have nothing to do, pray what does the audience stay for? 'tis very odd to expect the Unity of Place was generally held to follow as a corollary from Unity of Time.<sup>1</sup> Corneille, the first French poet who rigorously observes the rule, admits that he finds no such precept in Aristotle.<sup>2</sup> In defending it he is driven to desperate shifts, which end in a kind of compromise. He points out that the moderns are met by a difficulty the ancients did not encounter. The Greeks could make their kings meet and speak in public. In France such a familiarity was impossible; royal personages could not be brought forth from the seclusion of their chambers; nor could private confidences be exchanged anywhere but in the private apartments of the several characters. He would, therefore, admit some extension of the rule. He would allow a change of scene, provided that sequel of an action, when the actors have nothing more to do, and to be interested in a thing, which the actors are so little concerned in, that they may go to sleep.' It is needless to say, there is not a trace of all this in Aristotle.

<sup>2</sup> Others who had never read the Poetics were not slow to assert that all the Unities are there enjoined. Frederick the Great (on German Literature) ridicules the plays of Shakespeare as ridiculous farces, worthy of the savages of Canada; they offend against all the rules of the stage. 'For these rules are not arbitrary; you will find them in the Poetics of Aristotle, where Unity of Place, Unity of Time, and Unity of Interest are prescribed as the only means of making tragedy interesting.'

the action represented took place within a single town, and that the scene was not shifted in the same act. Again, the place (an abstract lieu théâtral) must be alluded to only under its general name—Paris, Rome, or the like—and the stage decoration must remain unaltered so far as this local area is concerned.<sup>1</sup>

Such were the anxious and minute contrivances which a great poet devised to enable the imagination to do its proper work. The principle, as Batteux carefully explained, was that if the scene of the action is changed while the spectator remains in one place, he will be reminded that he is assisting at an unreal performance; the imitation will be so far defective.

Far better—we feel—in the interests of the dramatic art was the practice of the Shakespearian theatre,—the bare stage without movable scenery, and the frank surrender of all attempt to cheat the senses. The poet simply invoked the aid of the imagination to carry his hearers through space and time; to

The abuse of distance, . . .’
Turning the accomplishment of many years

The problem of the 'Unities' cannot, indeed, have presented itself to Aristotle in its modern lights. But even if he had known what was to be written on the subject, he would, doubtless, have taken his stand no less decisively on the fundamental Unity of Action, and refrained from laying down any binding rules for change of scene or lapse of time. If Unity of Action is preserved, the other Unities will take care of themselves. Unity of Action is indeed in danger of being impaired by marked discontinuity of place or time. There are Spanish dramas in which the hero is born in Act i., and appears again on the scene as an old man at the close of the play. The missing spaces are almost of necessity filled in by the undramatic expedient of narrating what has occurred in the intervals. Yet even here all depends on the art of the dramatist. Years may elapse between successive acts without the unity being destroyed, as we see from The Winter's Tale.

After all, the drama is not possible without a certain idealisation of place and time. If the poet has once succeeded in transporting us to a far-off land and a distant age—to ancient Rome or Athens—we are not inclined to quarrel with him as to the number of hours or days over which the dramatic action extends. We do not ask at the end of each act, what the hour is by poet's time; and, should we seek to discover it from indications in the play, our curiosity will for the most part be baffled. There is no calendar for such a reckoning, no table of equivalent hours in the real and the ideal world. It is part of the poet's art to make us forget all time; and, if in his company we lose count of months and years, we do not cry out against the impossibility. For, on the one hand, the imagination is not to be cheated by puerile devices into the belief that its world is the world of reality: on the other, we can hardly place any limit on the demands to which it will respond, if only these demands are made by one who knows how. Shakespeare deals freely, and as he will, with place and time; yet he is generally nearer to the doctrine of the Poetics than those who fancied they wrote in strict accordance with the rules of that treatise.

French poets and writers on aesthetics did not derive their dramatic rules directly from the Greek models on which the Poetics of Aristotle is based. The genius of Rome was more congenial to them than that of Greece. Seneca, rather than Aeschylus or Sophocles, was the teacher of Corneille and Racine, and even Molière's comedy was powerfully affected by Plautus and Terence. The French, having learnt their three Unities from Roman writers, then sought to discover for them Aristotelian authority. They committed a further and graver error. Instead of resting the minor Unities of Time and Place on Unity of Action, they subordinated Unity of Action to the observance of the other rules. The result not unfrequently was to compress into a space of twelve or twenty-four hours a crowded sequence of incidents and a series of mental conflicts which needed a fuller development. The natural course of the action was cut short, and the inner consistency of character violated. A similar result followed from the scrupulous precautions taken to avoid a change of scene. The characters, instead of finding their way to the place where dramatic motives would have taken them, were compelled to go elsewhere, lest they should violate the Unities. The external rule was thus observed, but at the cost of that inward logic of character and events which is prescribed by the Poetics. The failures and successes of the modern stage alike prove the truth of the Aristotelian principle, that Unity of Action is the higher and controlling law of the drama. The Unities of Time and Place, so far as they can claim any artistic importance, are of secondary and purely derivative value.

CHAPTER VIII

THE IDEAL TRAGIC HERO

WITH the exception of the definition of tragedy itself, probably no passage in the Poetics has given rise to so much criticism as the description of the ideal tragic hero in ch. xiii. The qualities requisite to such a character are here deduced from the primary fact that the function of tragedy is to produce the katharsis of pity and fear; pity being felt for a person who, if not wholly innocent, meets with suffering beyond his deserts; fear being awakened when the sufferer is a man of like nature with ourselves.<sup>1</sup> Tragic character must be exhibited through the medium of a plot which has the capacity of giving full satisfaction to these emotions. Certain types, therefore, of character and certain forms of catastrophe are at once excluded, as failing either in whole or in part to produce the tragic effect.

eminently good<sup>1</sup> undergoing the change from prosperous to adverse fortune awakens neither pity nor fear. It shocks or repels us (μιαρόν ἐστίν). Next, and utterly devoid of tragic quality, is the representation of the bad man who experiences the contrary change from distress to prosperity. Pity and fear are here alike wanting. Even the sense of justice (τὸ φιλόανθρωπον)<sup>2</sup> is unsatisfied. The impression left by such a spectacle is, indeed, the

<sup>2</sup> Vahlen here (ch. xiii. 2) takes τὸ φιλόανθρωπον in its ordinary sense, as human sympathy with suffering, even if the suffering be deserved and the sympathy, therefore, fall short of ἔλεος. But the comparison of ch. xviii. 6 suggests a more special meaning. The outwitting of the clever rogue and the defeat of the brave villain are there given as instances of τὸ φιλόανθρωπον. It appears to denote that which gratifies the moral sense, which produces a feeling of satisfied justice. So it is taken by Zeller, Sussemihl and others. Properly it is a sympathetic human feeling; and this may be evoked either by the sight of suffering (merited or unmerited), or by the punishment of the evil-doer. In Rhet. ii. 9. 1386 b 26 sympathy with unmerited suffering—namely, ἔλεος—has as its other side the sense of satisfaction over merited misfortune—what is here called τὸ φιλόανθρωπον. ὁ μὲν γὰρ λιπούμενος ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀναξίως κακοπραγοῦσιν ἡσθήσεται ἢ ἄλυστος ἔσται ἐπὶ τοῖς ἐναντίως κακοπραγοῦσιν· οἷον τοῖς πατρυλίας καὶ μαιφόνους, ὅταν τύχῃσι τιμωρίας, οὐδεὶς ἂν λυπηθεῖν χρηστός· δεῖ γὰρ χαίρειν ἐπὶ τοῖς τοιούτοις. Dr. Lock has given me an interesting illustration of φιλόανθρωπον in the meaning here assigned to it from the Book of Wisdom i. 6, φιλόανθρωπον γὰρ πνεῦμα σοφία καὶ οὐκ ἀθιώσκει τὸν βλάσφημον.

With φιλόανθρωπον, 'satisfying to human feeling,' may be compared the later use of the word (common e.g. in Plutarch), of 'pleasing,' 'gratifying,' in a more general way.

exact opposite of ἔλεος, 'pity': it is that which the Greeks denoted by νέμεσις, the righteous anger or moral indignation excited by undeserved good fortune.<sup>1</sup> Again, there is the overthrow of the utter villain (ὁ σφόδρα πονηρός),—a catastrophe that satisfies the moral sense, but is lacking in the higher and distinctively tragic qualities. Lastly, Aristotle mentions the case which in his view answers all the requirements of art. It is that of a man who morally stands midway between the two extremes. He is not eminently good or just, though he leans to the side of goodness.<sup>2</sup> He is involved in misfortune, not, however, as the result of deliberate vice, but through some great flaw of character or fatal error in conduct.<sup>3</sup> He is, moreover, illustrious in rank and fortune; the chief motive, no doubt, for this requirement being that the signal nature of the catastrophe may be more strikingly exhibited.

Another possible case remains. though it is not among those here enumerated. The good man may be represented as passing from adversity to prosperity. On Aristotle's principles this would fail to produce the proper tragic effect; for, though in the course of the action we may be profoundly moved by the spectacle of threatened ruin, the total impression is alien to tragedy. The 'happy ending,' frequent as it is in Greek and in all dramatic literature, comes under the same general censure as attaches to a plot with a double thread of interest, and a double catastrophe,—prosperity for the good, misfortune for the bad.<sup>1</sup> Aristotle observes that 'owing to the weakness of the audience' a play so constructed generally passes as the best.<sup>2</sup> The effect is that of τὸ φιλάνθρωπον

Tragedie is to sayn a certain storie,
As olde books maken us memorie,

Is right enough to mochel folk, I gesse.
I say for me, it is a gret disese,

above mentioned : reward and punishment are in exact correspondence with desert. He himself

And ther abideth in prosperitee ;
Swiche thing is gladsom, as it thinketh me,
And of swiche thing were goodly for to telle.'

The Aristotelian view is maintained in Spectator No. 40, Tatler No. 82. On the other hand cf. Dryden, Dedication of the Spanish Friar : 'It is not so trivial an undertaking to make a tragedy end happily ; for 'tis more difficult to save than 'tis to kill. The dagger and the cup of poison are always in readiness ; but to bring the action to the last extremity, and then by probable means to recover all, will require the art and judgment of a writer and cost him many a pang in the performance.'

Dr. Johnson gives expression to the extreme view of 'poetical justice' in his criticism of King Lear (vol. ii. 164-5). 'Shakespeare has suffered the virtue of Cordelia to perish in a just cause, contrary to the natural idea of justice, to the hope of the reader, and what is yet more strange, to the faith of chronicles. Yet this conduct is justified by the Spectator, who blames Tate for giving Cordelia success and happiness in his alteration, and declares that, in his opinion, the tragedy has lost half its beauty. Dennis has remarked, whether justly or not, that to secure the favourable reception of Cato, the town was poisoned with much false and abominable criticism, and that endeavours had been used to discredit and decry poetical justice. A play in which the wicked prosper, and the virtuous miscarry, may doubtless be good, because it is a just representation of the events of human life : but since all reasonable beings naturally love justice, I cannot easily be persuaded, that the observation of justice makes a play worse ; or that if other excellences are equal, the audience will not always rise the better pleased for the triumph of persecuted virtue. In the present case the public has decided. Cordelia from the time of Tate has always retired with victory and felicity. And if my sensations could add anything to the general suffrage, I might relate, I was many years ago so shocked by Cordelia's death, what I know not whether I ever endured again to read the last scenes of the play till I undertook to revise them as an editor.'

regards the pleasure hence derived as proper rather to comedy, where all discords are reconciled, the bitterest foes part as friends, 'no one slays or is slain':<sup>1</sup>—or, as Goethe in a similar context puts it, 'no one dies, every one is married.'

The stress laid in this chapter on the unhappy ending is the key to the striking phrase in which Euripides, faulty as he may perhaps be in dramatic structure, is pronounced to be 'still the most tragic of poets.'<sup>2</sup> The saying must be read along with

The 'powerful tragic effect' on the stage (τραγικώταται φαίνονται, τραγικώτατός γε φαίνεται) is a serious reservation for Aristotle to make, for he requires a good tragedy to produce its proper effect merely by reading, ch. xiv. 1. See Susemihl (Introd. p. 29), who also compares the use of τραγικός in a somewhat restricted sense in the two other passages where it occurs in the Poetics—xiv. 7, τό τε γὰρ μίαιρον ἔχει, καὶ οὐ τραγικόν· ἀπαθὲς γάρ (where τραγικόν implies tragic disaster), and xviii. 5 (applied to Agathon), τραγικὸν γὰρ τοῦτο καὶ φιλόσοφον. Its limitation in the latter certain limiting expressions in the context, and in other passages of the Poetics. But whatever deductions may have to be made from the force of the phrase, the estimate of Euripides here given is directly connected <sup>1</sup> by Aristotle with the preference of the poet for the true tragic ending.

Reverting now to the several types of excluded characters, we may consider Aristotle's conclusions more in detail. First, the ἐπιεικής or perfectly blameless character is deemed unfit to be a tragic hero on the ground that wholly unmerited suffering causes repulsion, not fear or pity. Why, we may ask, not pity? Surely we feel pity for one who is in the highest sense ἀνάξιος, an innocent sufferer? In reply it has been sometimes said that such persons themselves despise the pain of suffering; they enjoy so much inward consolation that they have no need of our sympathy. 'Si vis me flere dolendum est primum ipsi tibi.' This may appear a cynical reflexion, though it can be so passage is very remarkable in connexion with φιλόανθρωπον. The discomfiture of the wicked man, there spoken of, does not answer to the true tragic idea; it merely 'satisfies the moral sense'; so that τραγικόν can hardly mean much more than strikingly dramatic. In ch. xiii. 6 the chief thought is the pathetic and moving power of Euripides. Cf. Probl. xviii. 6. 918 a 10, διὰ τί ἡ παρακαταλογὴ ἐν ταῖς ψόδαῖς τραγικόν where παθητικόν in the next line is used as an equivalent. In Plato, Rep. x. 602 B, τοὺς τε τῆς τραγικῆς ποιήσεως ἀπτομένους ἐν ἰαμβείοις καὶ ἐν ἔπεσι, the word includes the sad narratives of epic poetry as well as of tragedy.

put as to convey a real truth. The pity we feel for outward misfortune may be sunk in our admiration for the courage with which it is borne. Aristotle's answer, however, would probably be different. He too would say that pity is expelled by a stronger feeling; as in the Rhetoric 'terror tends to drive out pity.'<sup>1</sup> But the mention here of τὸ μισῶν suggests that the sense of outraged justice would displace the softer emotions. Lessing, agreeing with Aristotle on the main point, takes occasion to enforce his own favourite theory—not Aristotelian—which attributes a direct moral purpose to tragedy. He speaks of the 'mere thought in itself so terrible, that there should be human beings who can be wretched without any guilt of their own.'<sup>2</sup>

The unqualified rejection of such a theme as unsuited to tragedy may well surprise us. Aristotle had not to go beyond the Greek stage to find a guiltless heroine whose death does not shock the moral sense. Nothing but a misplaced ingenuity, or a resolve at all costs to import a moral lesson into the drama, can discover in Antigone any fault or failing which entailed on her suffering as its due penalty. She was so placed that she had to choose between contending duties; but who can doubt that she chose aright? She sacrificed the lower duty to the higher; and if, in so doing, her conduct fell short of formal perfection, the defect lay in the inherent one-sidedness of all human action in an imperfect world. Hers was a 'sinless crime,'<sup>1</sup> nor could Aristotle on his own principles call her other than ἐπιεικής, 'good' in the fullest sense of the word.

Yet his reluctance to admit a perfect character to the place of the protagonist has been almost justified by the history of the tragic drama. Such a character has been rarely chosen, and still more rarely has been successful. But the reason assigned in this passage does not appear to be the true one. Blameless goodness has seldom the quality needed to make it dramatically interesting. It wants the motive power which leads to decisive acts of will, which impels others to action and produces a collision of forces. Dramatic character implies some self-assertive energy. It is not a rounded or perfect whole; it realises itself within a limited sphere, and presses forward passionately in a single direction. It has generally a touch of egoism, by which it exercises a controlling influence over circumstances or over the wills of minor characters that are grouped around it. Goodness, on the other hand, with its unselfish, its self-effacing tendency, is apt to be immobile and uncombative. In refusing to strike back it brings the action to a standstill. Even where it has no lack of strong initiative, its impersonal ardour in the cause of right has not the same dramatic fascination as the spectacle of human weakness or passion doing battle with the fate it has brought upon itself.

Mazzini conceived the idea of a new drama in which man shall no longer appear as a rebel against the laws of existence, or the victim of an external struggle with his own nature, but as the ally of Providence, co-operating with the powers of good in that secular conflict whose drama is the history of the world. We may doubt whether such a drama can in the true sense be tragic. The death of the martyr—of the hero who leads a forlorn hope—of the benefactor of mankind who bears suffering with unflinching fortitude, and through suffering achieves moral victory—fills us with emotions of wonder and admiration; but it can hardly produce the thrill of fear or tragic awe, which Aristotle rightly felt to be an indispensable factor in true tragedy.<sup>1</sup> The reason perhaps is that tragedy, in its pure idea, shows us a mortal will engaged in an unequal struggle with destiny, whether that destiny be represented by the forces within or without the mind. The conflict reaches its tragic issue when the individual perishes, but through his ruin the disturbed order of the world is restored and the moral forces re-assert their sway. The death of the martyr presents to us not the defeat, but the victory of the individual; the issue of a conflict in which the individual is ranged on the same side as the higher powers, and the sense of suffering consequently lost in that of moral triumph.

The next case is that of the bad man who is raised from adverse to prosperous fortune. This, says Aristotle, is most alien to the spirit of tragedy. No one will dispute the observation; though we cannot adopt Dacier's reason for accepting it. 'There is nothing more opposed to the refining of the passions than the prosperity of the wicked; instead of correcting, it nourishes and strengthens them; for who would take the trouble to get rid of his vices, if they made him happy?'<sup>1</sup> Good fortune following upon a course of bad actions is frequent enough in life; none the less it is to be rigorously excluded from tragic and, indeed, from all art. It may excite a lively sense of impending terror, though even this is denied by Aristotle. It certainly awakens no pity, and—we may add with Aristotle—it offends the sense of justice. Even granting that art must touch us through our aesthetic sensibility, and has nothing directly to do with the sense of justice, the aesthetic effect itself will be one of pain and disquiet; the doubt and disturbance which arise from the spectacle of real life will be reproduced and perhaps intensified. In the drama our view of the universe needs to be harmonised, not confused; we expect to find the connexion of cause and effect in a form that satisfies the rational faculty. To suspend the operation of the moral law by the triumph of wickedness is to introduce the reign of caprice or blind chance.

The overthrow of signal villainy is next set aside by Aristotle as unsuited to tragedy,—in spite, as he expressly says, of the satisfaction it offers to the moral sense. We cannot feel pity when the suffering is deserved; we cannot feel fear when the sufferer is so far removed in nature from ourselves. Here again the judgment of Aristotle, if tested by concrete examples, receives on the whole striking confirmation. Yet this is precisely one of the cases where the inadequacy of his rules is most apparent. The limitation of view arises from applying a purely ethical instead of an aesthetic standard to dramatic character. Crime as crime has, it is true, no place in art; it is common, it is ugly. But crime may be presented in another light. Wickedness on a grand scale, resolute and intellectual, may raise the criminal above the commonplace and invest him with a sort of dignity. There is something terrible and sublime in mere will-power working its evil way, dominating its surroundings with a superhuman energy. The wreck of such power excites in us a certain tragic sympathy; not indeed the genuine pity which is inspired by unmerited suffering, but a sense of loss and regret over the waste or misuse of gifts so splendid.

It needs, however, the genius of a Shakespeare to portray this potent and commanding villainy. It was a perilous task to concentrate the whole interest of a play round a character such as Richard III.; and we may doubt whether Shakespeare himself would have ventured on it in the maturer period of his genius. The ancient drama offers nothing comparable to this great experiment—no such embodiment of an entirely depraved will, loveless and unhuman, fashioning all things with relentless adaptation to its own ends, yet standing sufficiently aloof from life to jest over it with savage humour. The wickedness of Richard III. is on a different level from that of Iago. In Iago we have no heroic criminal, but a plotter of a meaner order, in whom the faculty of intrigue amounts almost to genius; coldly diabolical, more malignant even than Richard, and delighting in evil for its own sake. Richard, equally devoid of moral scruple, and glorying in his ‘naked villainy,’ is yet a prince with royal purposes and an insight into affairs. His masterpieces of crime are forged by intellect and carried out with artistic finish and completeness. The moral sense is kept half in abeyance up to the close of such a drama. The badness of the man is almost lost in the sense of power. Tragic pity there cannot be for the protagonist; hardly even for his victims; terror and grandeur leave little room for any gentler feelings.

There is a certain 'contradiction,' Schiller observes,<sup>1</sup> 'between the aesthetic and the moral judgment.' 'Theft, for example, is a thing absolutely base . . . it is always an indelible brand stamped upon the thief, and aesthetically speaking he will always remain a base object. On this point taste is even less forgiving than morality, and its tribunal is more severe. . . . According to this view a man who robs would always be an object to be rejected by the poet who wishes to present serious pictures. But suppose this man is at the same time a murderer, he is even more to be condemned than before by the moral law. But in the aesthetic judgment he is raised one degree higher. . . . He who abases himself by a vile action can to a certain extent be raised by a crime, and can be thus reinstated in our aesthetic estimation. . . . In presence of a deep and horrible crime we no longer think of the quality but of the awful consequences of the action. . . . Directly we begin to tremble, all the delicacies of taste are reduced to silence. . . . In a word, the base element disappears in the terrible.'

Aristotle does not appear to have been alive to this effect of art. Still it must not be inferred from this passage, nor again from ch. xv.,<sup>1</sup> that all artistic portraiture of moral depravity is forbidden. The Menelaus of Euripides is twice cited as an example of character 'gratuitously bad,'<sup>2</sup> a phrase which implies that there may be a badness that is required by the dramatic motive and the structure of a play.<sup>3</sup> It will fall under the wider law which demands the light and shade of contrasted characters, —characters either standing out against one another in strong relief, or each forming the complement of the other. Thus we have such pairs as Antigone and Ismene, Odysseus and Neoptolemus, Lear and Gloucester, Hamlet and Laertes, Brutus and Antony. The principle once admitted will allow of the utmost divergence of ethical type. Aristotle admits the principle, but in a cursory and parenthetical manner, nor does he seem to have been aware of its range and significance.

We now come to the ideal protagonist of tragedy, as sketched in this chapter. He is composed of mixed elements, by no means supremely good, but a man 'like ourselves' (ὅμοιος). The expression, if taken alone, might seem to describe a person of mediocre virtue and average powers. But Aristotle must not be read in detached sections; and the comparison of ch. ii. and ch. xv. with our passage shows us that this character, while it has its basis in reality, transcends it by a certain moral elevation.<sup>1</sup> We could wish that Aristotle had gone farther and said explicitly that in power, even more than in virtue, the tragic hero must be raised above the ordinary level; that he must possess a deeper vein of feeling, or heightened powers of intellect or will; that the morally trivial, rather than the morally bad, is fatal to tragic effect. As it is, we arrive at the result that the tragic hero is a man of noble nature, like ourselves in elemental feelings and emotions; idealised, indeed, but with so large a share of our common humanity as to enlist our eager interest and sympathy. He falls from a position of lofty eminence; and the disaster that wrecks his life may be traced not to deliberate wickedness, but to some great error or frailty.

This last expression is not free from difficulty, and has been variously interpreted. The word ἁμαρτία by usage admits of various shades of meaning. As a synonym of ἁμαρτήμα and as applied to a single act,<sup>2</sup> it denotes an error due to inadequate

† knowledge of particular circumstances. According to strict usage we should add the qualification, that the circumstances are such as might have been known.<sup>1</sup> Thus it would cover any error of judgment arising from a hasty or careless view of the special case; an error which in some degree is morally culpable, as it might have been avoided. Error of this kind has the highest claim to pity or consideration.<sup>2</sup> But ἁμαρτία is also more laxly applied to an error due to unavoidable ignorance, for which the more proper term is ἀτύχημα, 'misfortune.'<sup>3</sup> In either case, however, the error is unintentional; it arises from want of knowledge; and its moral quality will depend on whether the individual is himself responsible for his ignorance.

Distinct from this, but still limited in its reference to a single act, is the moral ἁμαρτία proper, a fault or error where the act is conscious and

Lastly, the word may denote a defect of character, distinct on the one hand from an isolated error or fault, and, on the other, from the vice which has its seat in a depraved will. This use, though rarer, is still Aristotelian.<sup>2</sup> Under this head would be included any human frailty or moral weakness, a flaw of character that is not tainted by a vicious purpose. In our passage there is much to be said in favour of the last sense, as it is here brought into relation with other words of purely moral significance, words moreover which describe not an isolated act.<sup>3</sup> but a more permanent state.

On the other hand, there are many indications in the Poetics that the Oedipus Tyrannus of Sophocles is Aristotle's ideal play. Now Oedipus, though of a hasty and impulsive temperament, with something too of proud self-assertion, cannot, broadly speaking, be said to have owed his ruin to any striking moral defect. His character was not the determining factor in his fortunes. He, if any man, was in a genuine sense the victim of circumstances. In slaying Laius he was probably in some degree morally culpable. But the act was done certainly after provocation, and possibly in self-defence.<sup>1</sup> His life was a chain of errors, the most fatal of all being the marriage with his mother. All minor acts of ignorance culminated here; and yet it was a purely unconscious offence to which no kind of blame attached. If Oedipus is the person who suggested to Aristotle the formula of this chapter, we can hardly limit the word to its moral meaning, as marking either a defect of character or a single passionate or inconsiderate act. ἁμαρτία may well include the three meanings above mentioned, which in English cannot be covered by a single term.<sup>2</sup> The larger sense, if it may be assumed, will add to the profound significance of Aristotle's remark. A single great error, whether morally culpable or not; a single great defect in a character otherwise noble,—each and all of these may carry with them the tragic issues of life and death.

In any case no sharp distinction can be drawn between moral and purely intellectual error, least of all by a philosopher who laid as much stress as Aristotle did on right knowledge as an element in conduct. A moral error easily shades off into a mere defect of judgment. But that mere defect may work as potently as crime. Good intentions do not make actions right. The lofty disinterestedness of Brutus cannot atone for his want of practical insight. In the scheme of the universe a wholly unconscious error violates the law of perfection; it disturbs the moral order of the world. Distinctions of motive—the moral guilt or purity of the agent—are not here in question. So too in tragedy those are doomed who innocently err no less than those who sin consciously. Nay, the tragic irony sometimes lies precisely herein, that owing to some inherent frailty or flaw—it may be human short-sightedness, it may be some error of blood or judgment—the very virtues of a man hurry him

* τὰδ' εἰς ἐμαυτὸν τοὺς ἐμούς θ' ἡμαρτανον.

forward to his ruin. Othello in the modern drama, Oedipus in the ancient—widely as they differ in moral guilt—are the two most conspicuous examples of ruin wrought by characters, noble indeed, but not without defects, acting in the dark, and, as it seemed, for the best.

We should probably be putting too great a pressure on the words of Aristotle and should go beyond his intention, if we sought to include under the rule of ch. xiii. such a character as Macbeth. Still the thought of our passage lends itself easily to this enlargement of the meaning. Macbeth does not start with criminal purpose. In its original quality his nature was not devoid of nobility. But with him the ἀμαρτία, the primal defect, is the taint of ambition, which under the promptings of a stronger character than his own and a more vivid imagination works in him as a subtle poison. In a case such as this, tragic fear is heightened into awe, as we trace the growth of a mastering passion, which beginning in a fault or frailty enlarges itself in its successive stages, till the first false step has issued in crime, and crime has engendered fresh crime. It is of the essence of a great tragedy to bring together the beginning and the end; to show the one implicit in the other. The intervening process disappears; the causal chain so unites the whole that the first ἀμαρτία bears the weight of the tragic result.

Aristotle's theory of the tragic character has suggested two divergent lines of criticism. On the one hand it is urged, that the rule δι' ἀμαρτίαν leaves no room for a 'true tragic collision.' The fate of the hero is determined by forces outside the control of the human will. A mere error, due to the inherent limitations of man's faculties, brings ruin. Thus, it is said, the highest form of tragedy in which character is destiny, is at once excluded. Nothing is left but the drama of an external fate.

This objection assumes that the tragic ἀμαρτία is in truth no more than an ἀτύχημα, a mere accident, a misadventure, the circumstances being such that reason and foresight are unavailing. Now, even if the word, as here used, were so limited, a collision of forces such as is essential to the drama would not be wanting. If a man is so placed that he is at war with the forces outside him—either the forces of the universe, the fixed conditions of existence, the inevitable laws of life, which constitute 'Fate'; or the forces that reside in other wills that cross and thwart his own—the result may be a tragic conflict. The ancient drama is chiefly, though by no means exclusively, the representation of a conflict thus unwittingly begun, however much purpose may be involved in its later stages. The spectacle of a man struggling with his fate affords ample scope for the display of will-power and ethical qualities. The Oedipus Tyrannus portrays a tragic conflict none the less moving because the original error which leads to the catastrophe springs from the necessary blindness and infirmity of human nature.

But if we yield the main contention of these critics and admit that a 'true tragic collision' is one in which character and passion determine destiny ; in which the individual by an act of will enters on a conflict where the forces enlisted on either side are chiefly moral forces, Aristotle's phrase, if we have rightly interpreted it, will still include the most interesting and significant of such cases. The great frailty will then be a moral frailty. The resulting collision will in general be one of two kinds. Either the individual from levity or passion violates a known right, encroaches on a sphere not his own, and provokes a conflict which reacts on his character and culminates in tragic disaster : or the collision will be one between internal moral forces, the scene of the conflict being the heart of man. Hence we get the struggles of conscience, the wavering purpose, the divided will,—dramatic motives rarely found in the older Greek tragedians, but which with Euripides entered into the domain of the drama and thenceforth held an assured place. The objection, therefore, to this extent appears to be invalid. At the same time, as already indicated, Aristotle's doctrine is in a measure defective. It fails to take account of two exceptional types of tragedy,—that which exhibits the antagonism between a pure will and a disjointed world, or between a grand but criminal purpose and the higher moral forces with which it is confronted.

Another class of critics have been reluctant under any circumstances to disallow the authority of Aristotle. It was gravely observed by Roger Bacon that 'Aristotle hath the same authority in philosophy that the Apostle Paul hath in divinity.' After the Renaissance the general intellectual sovereignty already wielded by Aristotle was extended, especially in France, to the whole field of literature. Every well constructed tragedy, ancient or modern, was supposed to square with the rules of the Poetics. When the facts of literary history refused to adjust themselves to the text, the meaning of the text was strained or explained away, till the original rules were not unfrequently forced to bear the very sense they were designed to exclude. So far was the infallibility of Aristotle carried that on one occasion Dacier makes short work with an Italian commentator, who had ventured to find an inconsistency between a passage of the Poetics and the words of Holy Writ. He brushes the objection aside with a simple reductio ad absurdum. 'As if Divinity and the Holy Scriptures could ever be contrary to the sentiments of Nature on which Aristotle founds his judgments.' <sup>1</sup> Methods of interpretation were applied to the Poetics with which we are more familiar in Biblical criticism. The words of Aristotle were explained and defended by just those expedients that have been resorted to in support of the verbal interpretation of Scripture.

Corneille was one of the adepts in the art of adding glosses and saving clauses to the Aristotelian text. Though he has left many luminous statements of the principles of poetry, his work as an expositor is too often inspired by the desire to reconcile Aristotelian rules with plays of his own, which had been written before he had become acquainted with the Poetics. A single instance—one of those quoted by Lessing—will show his easy method of harmonising difficulties. Character, we are told in the Poetics (ch. xv.), must be χρηστά, 'good':—the word can bear no other than the moral meaning. Corneille, seeing that this requirement, taken rigidly, would condemn a large number of admirable plays, surmises that what Aristotle demands is 'the brilliant or elevated character of a virtuous or criminal habit.' <sup>2</sup> He instances his own Cleopatra, a heroine who is 'extremely wicked'; 'there is no murder from which she shrinks.' 'But all her crimes are connected with a certain grandeur of soul, which has in it something so elevated, that while we condemn her actions, we must still admire the source whence they flow.'

In itself this criticism is on the right track; but not as an explanation of the Aristotelian χρηστὰ ἦθῃ. It is what Aristotle ought to have said, not what he says. As Lessing observes,<sup>1</sup> Aristotle's 'goodness' must on this view be 'of a sort that agrees with moral badness as well as with moral goodness.' In a similar spirit of mistaken loyalty to Aristotle and in similar defiance of linguistic usage, other commentators, — Bossu, Dacier, Metastasio — persuaded themselves that χρηστὰ ἦθῃ could mean 'well marked' characters, in this way rescuing the word from its objectionable moral limitations.<sup>2</sup> Lessing here, while avoiding these errors of interpretation and retaining the plain meaning of the words, does so on grounds which are wholly un-Aristotelian. 'Corneille,' he says, 'could not have had a more pernicious idea' than that vice may be ennobled by aesthetic treatment. 'If we carry it out there is an end to all truth, and all delusion, to all moral benefit of tragedy. . . . What folly to desire to deter by the unhappy consequences of vice if we conceal its

There is another method by which the authority of Aristotle has been vindicated. Plays have been brought into harmony with his supposed rules at the cost of manifest violence done to the poems themselves. Shakespeare has not escaped this vice of interpretation. Gervinus dominated, as it would seem, by the idea of a moral ἀναπρία is inclined to find some culpable error wherever there is tragic ruin. Such an error is proved to be the cause, or partial cause, of the misfortune that ensues not merely to the protagonist, but also to the subordinate dramatic characters. He discovers a 'poetic justice' in the death of Duncan, whose unwary security led him to accept the hospitality of Macbeth; in the death of Cordelia, whose want of 'wise and prudent foresight' places her in contrast with Edgar, and justifies the difference between her fate and his; in the death of Desdemona, who is guilty of 'dangerous intercession on behalf of Cassio,' and 'falls into sin through innocence and goodness.'

Setting aside these strange perversions of criticism, we may well believe that Aristotle would have felt some surprise at being assumed to have laid down a binding code of poetical rules for all time and place. The contrast, is, indeed, a curious one between his own tentative manner and the dogmatic conclusions based on what he has written. He feels his way, he tacitly corrects or supplements what he has previously said; with a careless ease he throws out suggestions, without guarding against misconception. He little thought of the far-reaching meaning that would one day be attached to each stray utterance. It is not merely the fragmentary form of the Poetics and the gaps and errors in the text that should warn us against straining the significance of isolated expressions. Aristotle's own manner is allusive and incomplete. He does not write with the fear of other critics before his eyes. He assumes an audience already familiar with the general drift of his thought, able to fill in what is unsaid and to place his rules in proper light and perspective.

in an interesting article in the Classical Review, vol. ix. pp. 251 ff. The περιπέτεια is distinct from the μετάβασις or change of fortune; it is merely one of the means by which the μετάβασις is brought about. According to its definition in Poet. xi. 1, it is a change by which a line of action intended to produce a certain effect produces the opposite,—an overruling of the intention of one of the agents. The first instance given by Aristotle (xi. 1) is from the Oedipus Tyrannus, 1002 ff., where the intended means of proving the king's innocence becomes, by the irony of events, the most convincing proof of his guilt. Another illustration of its meaning Dr. Lock adds the story of Shylock in the Merchant of Venice, of Adrastus in Herodotus, of Haman and Mordecai in the book of Esther, of Joseph and his brethren. He further observes that 'περιπέτεια is to actions what irony is to language. In the latter case, words are caught up by circumstances and charged with a fuller meaning than the speaker meant; in the former, deeds are equally caught up out of his grasp and charged with a meaning the very opposite of that which the agent meant.' Hence, we may note, περιπέτεια is often the nearest equivalent for what is known in modern criticism as the 'Irony of Destiny.' Among τὰ ἐλαεινά enumerated in Rhet. ii. 8. 1386 a 12 is τὸ ὅθεν προσήκεν ἀγαθὸν τι ὑπάρξαι, κακὸν τι συμβῆναι.

Apart, however, from this special and technical meaning, Aristotle certainly uses the word in a simpler sense for the mere development or evolution of incident out of incident. Mr. Prickard has called my attention to a passage in de Hist. Anim. viii. 2. 590 b 13, where περιπέτεια is applied to the turn of incident by which the polypus eats the crab, the crab eats the conger, and the conger eats the polypus. In this looser sense I take the phrase ἐκ περιπετείας (Poet. xvi. 3), which is used of the recognition of Odysseus by his nurse (Odys. xix. 396 ff.), as opposed to an ἀναγνώρισις πίστεως ἕνεκα (i.e. with the deliberate intention to convince). Mr. Lock explains it slightly otherwise, as = 'accidentally.' He compares the usage of the word in Polybius for 'an accident,' or 'a disaster.'

what is good in tragic art, but what is best; he is describing the ideal tragedy, with the ideal hero to correspond. The way in which other types of plot and character are dismissed is, no doubt, too sweeping, too summary, and partakes of the same exaggeration as certain remarks in ch. vi. about the subordinate place of character in the drama.<sup>1</sup> It is, however, a feature of Aristotle's manner, especially in his more popular treatises, to set aside the less preferred of two alternatives in words which imply unqualified rejection. The ideal tragedy, as here sketched by him, is one which will excite pity and fear in no ordinary combination, but these two emotions heightened to their utmost capacity under the conditions of the most perfect art. We cannot infer that he would condemn as utterly bad all that did not come up to these requirements. There may be an inferior, but still an interesting tragedy, in which the union of the terrible and the pathetic does not answer to the full tragic idea. The play will fall short—so Aristotle would probably say—in a greater or less degree of perfection, but it does not cease to be tragedy.

When due weight has been given to these considerations, the formula here proposed for the character of the tragic hero will still remain incomplete and inadequate. Yet—as is often the case with Aristotle's sayings—it contains a profound truth, and a capacity for adaptation beyond what was immediately present to the mind of the writer. He insists on the conditions above specified as requisite if we would merge our own personality in the creation of the poet. No 'faultily faultless' hero, any more than a consummate villain, can inspire so vital a sympathy as the hero whose weakness and whose strength alike bring him within the range of our common humanity. Modern literature, and above all the Shakespearian drama, while proving that the formula of Aristotle is too rigid, have also revealed new meanings in the idea of the tragic ἀμαρτία. Its dramatic possibilities have been enlarged and deepened. In Hamlet, Othello, Lear, Macbeth, Coriolanus, we have the ruin of noble natures through some defect of character. In infinitely various ways it has been shown that the most dramatic of motives is the process by which a frailty, or flaw of nature, grows and expands till it culminates in tragic disaster.

PLOT AND CHARACTER IN TRAGEDY

OF the six elements into which Aristotle analyses a tragedy,<sup>1</sup> plot (μῦθος) holds the first place. Next in order is placed ēthos (ἦθος), and then diánoia (διάνοια). Each of these terms needs some explanation.

Plot in the drama, in its fullest sense, is the artistic equivalent of 'action' in real life.<sup>2</sup> We have already observed<sup>3</sup> that 'action' (πρᾶξις) in Aristotle is not a purely external act, but an inward process which works outward, the expression of a man's rational personality. Sometimes it is used for 'action' or 'doing' in its strict and limited sense; sometimes for that side of right conduct (εὐπραξία) in which doing is only one element, though the most important. Again, it can denote 'faring' as well as 'doing': hence, in the drama, where 'action' is represented by the plot, it must

The πρᾶξις of the drama has primary reference to that kind of action which, while springing from the inward power of will, manifests itself in external doing. The very word 'drama' indicates this idea. The verb (δρᾶν), from which the noun comes, is the strongest of the words used to express the notion of doing; it marks an activity exhibited in outward and energetic form.<sup>2</sup> In the drama the characters are not described, they enact their own story and so reveal themselves. We know them not from what we are told of them, but by their performance before our eyes.<sup>3</sup> Without action in this sense a poem

But this does not exhaust the idea of πρᾶξις as understood by Aristotle. Among the reasons he gives for the pre-eminent place assigned to the plot, one is of fundamental importance. Tragedy, he explains, is an imitation of an action which is an image of human life,—of its supreme welfare or misery; that life itself consisting in a mode of action, not in a mere quality of mind<sup>1</sup>—in a form of moral energy or activity, which has a profoundly inward as well as an outward side. The plot or πρᾶξις of the drama reproduces this most significant mode of action; it does not stop short at strenuous doing. Still less is it a representation of purely outward fortune or misfortune. The words used by Aristotle are not μίμησις εὐτυχίας καὶ δυστυχίας, but μίμησις πράξεως καὶ βίου. The former phrase would be too external, too superficial to sum up the essence and meaning of a tragedy as a whole, though it is through the outward turns of fortune that the catastrophe is brought about; these are the medium by which the inner sense of the action is revealed.

The plot, then, contains the kernel of that 'action' which it is the business of tragedy to represent. The word 'action,' as is evident from what has been said, requires to be interpreted with much latitude of meaning. It embraces not only the deeds, the incidents, the situations, but also the mental processes, and the motives which underlie the outward events or which result from them.<sup>1</sup> It is the compendious expression for all these forces working together towards a definite end.

Next we come to ēthos and dianoia. In their aesthetic application these present some difficulties. Aristotle appears, indeed, to bestow unusual pains on elucidating their meaning, for he gives at least two definitions or interpretations of each in ch. vi., which again are supplemented by the observations of ch. xv. regarding ēthos, and of ch. xix. regarding dianoia.<sup>2</sup> Yet a clear and consistent view

<sup>2</sup> Mr. R. P. Hardie (Mind, vol. iv. No. 15) observes that while the expression or imitation of the πράξις is called the μῦθος, there are no special words for the μίμησις of ἦθος and of διάνοια, and cannot be extracted from ch. vi. in the form in which we have it; and this fact, taken in conjunction with the multiplicity of definitions, has afforded some ground for suspecting that there hence both are ambiguously used, (1) as implied in the visible πρᾶξις, (2) as = μίμησις τοῦ ἥθους and μίμησις τῆς διανοίας, where a certain amount of λόγος is required to make clear to the audience what is going on in the minds of the agents, without which knowledge the πρᾶξις cannot be rightly understood.

The dramatic ἥθος is defined in the following passages :—

- (i) Poet. vi. 6, τὰ δὲ ἥθη (λέγω), καθ' ὃ ποιούς τινες εἶναι φαιμεν τοῖς πράττοντας: cf. vi. 10, εἰσὶν δὲ κατὰ μὲν τὰ ἥθη ποιοὶ τινες. These passages are both somewhat inconsistent with vi. 5, where the character of persons (ποιοὶ τινες) is said to be determined not by ἥθος alone, but by ἥθος and διάνοια.
- (ii) Poet. vi. 17 (where ἥθος is in the second sense above mentioned, = μίμησις τοῦ ἥθους), ἔστιν δὲ ἥθος μὲν τὸ τοιοῦτον ὃ δηλοῖ τὴν προαίρεσιν ὅπου τίς [προ]αίρεῖται ἢ φεῖγεται· διόπερ οὐκ ἔχουσιν ἥθος τῶν λόγων ἐν οἷς οὐκ ἔστι δῆλον ἢ ἐν οἷς μὴδ' ὅλως ἔστιν ὃ τι [προ]αίρεται ἢ φεῖγεται ὁ λέγων. (For the reading see Crit. Notes.) In this context the reference is to the dramatic λόγοι which express (a) ἥθος, (b) διάνοιαν. Cf. the rule for rhetorical λόγοι in Rhet. viii. 16. 1417 a 15, ἡθικὴν δὲ χρὴ τὴν διήγησιν εἶναι. ἔσται δὲ τοῦτο, ἂν εἰδῶμεν τί ἥθος ποιεῖ. ἐν μὲν δὴ τὸ προαίρεσιν δηλοῦν, ποιοῦν δὲ τὸ ἥθος τῷ ποιοῦν ταύτην· ἢ δὲ προαίρεσις ποῖα τῷ τέλει.
- (iii) Poet. xv. 1, where ἥθος is expressed by any λόγος or πρᾶξις that manifests moral purpose: ἔξει δὲ ἥθος μὲν εἰάν ὥσπερ ἐλέχθη ποιῇ φανερὸν ὃ λόγος ἢ ἡ πρᾶξις προαίρεσιν τινα χρηστὸν δὲ εἰάν χρηστὴν.

The dramatic διάνοια is thus explained :—

- (i) Poet. vi. 8, διάνοιαν δὲ, ἐν ὅσοις λέγοντες ἀποδεικνύασιν τι may be both omissions and interpolations in the text. In what follows we will confine ourselves to certain broad conclusions, though even these may not all pass unchallenged.

ἡ καὶ ἀποφαίνονται γνώμην. A γνώμη is a general maxim, and ἀποφαίνεσθαι, 'enunciate,' a verbum proprium in connexion with it: so καθόλου τι ἀποφαίνονται in § 17. A γνώμη, though usually a moral maxim, exhibits διάνοια rather than ἦθος, probably because it is thought of as the starting-point or conclusion of an argument. See the use of γνῶμαι in Rhet. ii. 21. 1395 b 14 as rhetorical enthymemes. There, however, they are said to give an ethical character to speeches.

- (ii) Poet. vi. 15, τρίτον δὲ ἡ διάνοια· τοῦτο δὲ ἔστιν τὸ λέγειν δύνασθαι τὰ ἐνόντα καὶ τὰ ἀρμόττοντα.

- (iii) xix. 1-2, ἔστι δὲ κατὰ τὴν διάνοιαν ταῦτα, ὅσα ὑπὸ τοῦ λόγου δεῖ παρωσκευασθῆναι. μέρη δὲ τούτων τό τε ἀποδεικνύειν καὶ τὸ λύειν καὶ τὸ πάθη παρασκευάζειν, οἷον ἔλεον ἢ φόβον ἢ ὀργὴν καὶ ὅσα τοιαῦτα, καὶ ἔτι μέγεθος καὶ μικρότητας. Here the διάνοια that is manifested in dramatic λόγοι is brought within the domain of Rhetoric (τὰ μὲν οὖν περὶ τὴν διάνοιαν ἐν τοῖς περὶ ῥητορικῆς κείσθω).

Finsler (p. 79) is, I think, right in referring the phrase τὸ πάθη παρασκευάζειν to the emotional effects which the dramatis personae produce on one another by their λόγοι, not (as commonly interpreted) to the excitation of feeling in the minds of the audience. It may be observed that the πάθη mentioned are not only ἔλεος and φόβος but also ὀργή καὶ ὅσα τοιαῦτα.

Mr. R. P. Hardie (l.c.) approaches to this view, but takes the phrase in the sense of 'supply (to the spectators) the πάθη of οἱ λέγοντες,'—a sense which παρασκευάζειν could hardly bear.

and in many contexts this is its natural English equivalent. But if we would speak of character in its widest sense, as including all that reveals a man's personal and inner self—his intellectual powers no less than the will and the emotions—we go beyond the meaning of the Aristotelian ēthos. In the Poetics, ēthos and dianoia are each one side of character; they are two distinct factors which unite to constitute the concrete and living person. Character in its most comprehensive sense depends on these two elements, which, again, are declared to be the causes of action, and to determine its quality.<sup>1</sup> Ethos, as explained by Aristotle, is the moral element in character. It reveals a certain state or direction of the will. It is an expression of moral purpose, of the permanent disposition and tendencies, the tone and sentiment of the individual. Dianoia is the thought, the intellectual element, which is implied in all rational conduct, through which alone ēthos can find outward expression, and which is separable from ēthos only by a process of abstraction.

we find that ēthos reveals itself both in the speeches and in the actions of the dramatic characters in a manner corresponding to the twofold manifestations of ēthos in real life.<sup>1</sup> But we observe with surprise that ēthos as revealed in action is but lightly touched on. Still more surprising is it that though dianoia in real life is stated to be one of the two causes of action, there is no express recognition of it as similarly manifested in the drama. The reason of the omission may possibly be that action is treated <sup>1</sup> Note 2, p. 336. Mr. Bosanquet in his acute observations on plot and character-drawing (History of Aesthetic, pp. 70 ff.) argues against ἦθος being taken to mean 'character in the sense in which character is understood to-day, to be the object of artistic portraiture in Shakespeare or Thackeray.' The remarks in the text bear out this contention, though from another point of view. It is more difficult to agree entirely with his view that ἦθος in the Poetics is something merely 'typical and generic,' 'as we say good or bad character,' a certain type of disposition or moral temperament without the more individual traits. We may indeed readily admit that the subtlety and delicacy of modern character-drawing did not present themselves to Aristotle's mind: more simple and elementary qualities formed the basis of dramatic character as he understood it. But it appears pretty certain that he thought of individual portraiture, and not merely of the delineation of a moral type. This seems to follow if only from the rules about τὰ ἦθη in ch. xv., especially from the requirement that the law of necessity or probability, prescribed for the plot, shall apply also to the speeches and actions of the dramatic persons (§§ 5-6). This inner rationality surely demands a strong basis of individual character.

Mr. R. P. Hardie (l.c.) similarly observes in reference to ch. xiii., where ἦθος is discussed in reference to μῦθος, that 'the drift of the whole passage implies that ἦθος does not necessarily 'mean to Aristotle a simple generic type, but that its complexity is precisely on a level with the complexity of the plot.'

in the Poetics as a separate and independent element of tragedy, and kept distinct as far as possible from the other elements. This is, indeed, one of the inconveniencies arising from the highly analytic method of Aristotle in dealing with the organic parts of an artistic whole, as also with the phenomena of life. It is a method that tends to divert our attention from the interlacing union of the parts and from their final synthesis. Be the cause what it may, explicit mention is made in our text of the dramatic dianoia as embodied only in speech not in action.

In the dramatic dialogue, the persons who converse do not discuss abstract truth such as the problems of mathematics;<sup>1</sup> they desire to explain their own doings and influence others. The two elements, ēthos and dianoia, may indeed be found side by side in one and the same discourse; but even so, there is an appreciable difference between them. Wherever moral choice, or a determination of the will is manifested, there ēthos appears.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Inferior writers attempted, it would seem, to make ethical monologues take the place of a well constructed plot. Poet. vi. 12, ἔτι εἰάν τις ἐφεξῆς θῇ ῥήσεις ἠθικὰς καὶ λέξει καὶ διανοίᾳ εὖ πεποιημένας, οὐ ποιήσει ὁ ἦν τῆς τραγωδίας ἔργον. Cf. Plat. Phædr. 268 c—269 a, where such ῥήσεις are reckoned among τὰ πρὸ τραγωδίας, 'the preliminaries of tragedy,' not as τὰ τραγικὰ.

Under dianoia are included the intellectual reflexions of the speaker; the proof of his own statements, the disproof of those of his opponents, his general maxims concerning life and conduct, as elicited by the action and forming part of a train of reasoning. The emphasis laid by Aristotle on this dialectical dianoia is doubtless connected with the decisive influence exercised by political debate and forensic pleading on the Greek theatre, the ἀγών of the ecclesia or of the law-courts being reproduced in the ἀγών of the drama.

A few sentences of cardinal importance as to plot and character, from ch. vi. 9–11, must here be quoted: ‘Tragedy is an imitation, not of men, but of an action and of life, and life consists in action, and its end is a mode of action, not a quality. Now character determines men’s qualities, but it is by their actions that they are happy or the reverse. Dramatic action, therefore, is not with a view to the representation of character: character comes in as subsidiary to the actions. Hence the incidents and the plot are the end of a tragedy; and the end is the chief thing of all. Again, without action there cannot be a tragedy; there may be without character.’ The eager insistence with which Aristotle maintains the subordination of ēthos to plot<sup>1</sup> leads him into a certain exaggeration of statement. The two elements are set against one another in sharp and impossible opposition. 'Without action there cannot be a tragedy; there may be without ēthē.'<sup>1</sup> Clearly, this last remark cannot be pressed in a perfectly literal sense.<sup>2</sup> The meaning intended probably is, that there may be a ἔστιν τε (ὁ μῦθος) μίμησις πράξεως καὶ διὰ ταύτην μάλιστα τῶν πραττόντων.

'Plot' in the full sense of the word is the 'action' (in the large Greek meaning of πρᾶξις), and includes not only the circumstances and incidents which form the main part of 'plot' as popularly conceived, but also 'character' in the full dramatic sense of tragedy in which the moral character of the individual agents is so weakly portrayed as to be of no account in the evolution of the action. The persons may be mere types, or marked only by class characteristics, or lacking in those distinctive qualities out of which dramatic action grows.<sup>1</sup> The next sentence adds by way of corroboration that 'the tragedies of most of our modern poets are devoid of character.' The later tragedians attempted, it would seem, by an ingenious mechanism of plot to make up for their want of skill in character-drawing. The other side of the antithesis above quoted cannot be disputed: 'Without action there cannot be a tragedy'; for action is the differentia of drama, and must ever remain the primary and controlling principle. The illustration from painting

'characters producing an action.' An antithesis, therefore, between 'character' and 'plot,' thus understood, is obviously impossible.

On these grounds, we may say that 'character,' in the popular sense, exists for the sake of the 'action'; but 'character' in the full sense cannot correctly be said to exist for the sake of the 'action.' What is meant in the latter instance is rather, that, dramatically, the significance of the 'characters' arises from their place in the 'action.'

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Bosanquet (History of Aesthetic, p. 73) explains Aristotle's meaning a little differently. 'He may not have been contrasting the plot, as a mere puzzle and solution, with the portrayal of individual human character, but he may rather have intended to oppose the man as revealed in action, or in speech which contributes to the march of incident, with monologue or conversation simply intended to emphasise this or that type of disposition in the interlocutors' (cf. supra, p. 341, note 2).

in ch. vi. 15, which has been subjected to some strained interpretations, throws further light on the reason why ēthos holds a position subsidiary to the plot or action. 'The most beautiful colours, laid on confusedly, will not give as much pleasure as the chalk outline of a portrait.'<sup>1</sup> Here the outlined sketch corresponds to the outline of plot. Ethos divorced from plot is like a daub of beautiful colour, which apart from form gives little pleasure. The plot is the groundwork, the design, through the medium of which ēthos derives its meaning and dramatic value.

The whole gist of the argument is finally summed up thus: 'The plot is the first principle, and, as it were, the soul of a tragedy.'<sup>2</sup> The analogy here indicated goes deeper than might at once be apparent from the English words. The precise point of the comparison depends on the relation in which the soul stands to the body in the Aristotelian philosophy.<sup>3</sup> A play is a kind of living organism. Its animating principle is the plot. As in the animal and vegetable world the soul or principle of life is the primary and moving force, the ἀρχή from which the development of the organism proceeds, so it is with the plot in tragedy.<sup>1</sup> Round this nucleus the parts grow and group themselves. It is the origin of movement, the starting-point and basis of the play. Without it the play could not exist. It is the plot, again, which gives to the play its inner meaning and reality, as the soul does to the body. To the plot we look in order to learn what the play means; here lies its essence, its true significance. Lastly, the plot is 'the end of . . . tragedy'<sup>2</sup> as well as the beginning. Through the plot the intention of the play is realised. The distinctive emotional effect which the incidents are designed to produce is inherent in the artistic structure of the whole. Above all, it is the plot that contains those Reversals of Intention (περιπέτειαι)<sup>3</sup> and other decisive moments, which most powerfully awaken tragic feeling and excite the pleasure appropriate to tragedy.

<sup>1</sup> The constant use of συνιστάναι in the biological treatises of Aristotle should be compared with its meaning in the Poetics as applied to the formation and organic structure of a tragedy. De Gen. Anim. ii. 1. 733 b 20, ἥς (γονῆς) εἰσέλθοισης τὰ ζῷα συνίσταται καὶ λαμβάνει τὴν οἰκείαν μορφήν. ii. 4. 739 b 33, οὕτως δὲ συστή τὸ κύημα ἤδη . . . iii. 2. 753 b 3, γίγνεται τροφή τοῖς συνισταμένοις ζώοις. <sup>3</sup> See p. 329, note 2.

Aristotle's doctrine of the primary importance of action or plot has been disputed by many modern critics. Plot, it is argued, is a mere external framework, a piece of mechanism designed to illustrate the working of character. Character is in thought prior to action and is implied in it. Events have no meaning, no interest, except so far as they are supposed to proceed from will. Action is defined, expressed, interpreted by character. The question, however, which this chapter of the Poetics raises is not whether one element can in logical analysis be shown ultimately to contain the other; we have rather to ask which of the two is the more fundamental as regards the artistic conception and dramatic structure of a play. We will therefore inquire shortly what in its simplest analysis is meant by the drama,—what it is that constitutes dramatic action.

Action, as has been shown, is the first artistic necessity of a play, the controlling condition of its existence. But mere action is not enough; an isolated deed, however terrible, however pathetic, has not in it the dramatic quality. Action, to be dramatic, must be exhibited in its development and in its results; it must stand in reciprocal and causal relation to certain mental states. We desire to see the feelings out of which it grows, the motive force of will which carries it to its conclusion; and, again, to trace the effect of the deed accomplished upon the mind of the doer,—the emotions there generated as they become in turn new factors of action, and as they react thereby on the other dramatic characters. The drama, therefore, is will or emotion in action.

Further, the dramatic action forms a complete whole: it is a coherent series of events, standing in organic relation to one another and bound together by the law of cause and effect. The internal centre, the pivot round which the whole system turns, is the plot. The characters are dramatic only so far as they are grouped round this centre, and work in with the movement of events towards an appointed end. Free and self-determined though they are, they exercise their freedom within a sphere which is prescribed by this primary condition of dramatic art. They reveal their personality not in all its fulness, but to such an extent as the natural course of the action may require. The situation and the circumstances in which they are placed, the other wills with which they come into collision, are precisely those which are best fitted to search out their weak places, to elicit their energy, and exhibit it in action.

But the drama not only implies emotion expressing itself in a complete and significant action and tending towards a certain end; it also implies a conflict. We may even modify Aristotle's phrase and say, that the dramatic conflict, not the mere plot, is 'the soul of a tragedy.' In every drama there is a collision of forces. Man is imprisoned within the limits of the actual. Outside him is a necessity which restricts his freedom, a superior power with which his will frequently collides. Again, there is the inward discord of his own divided will ; and, further, the struggle with other human wills which obstruct his own. The delineation of character is determined by the fact that a dramatic conflict of some kind has to be represented, and by the relation in which the several antagonistic forces stand to the plot as a whole. But while conflict is the soul of the drama, every conflict is not dramatic. In real life, as Aristotle points out,<sup>1</sup> all action does not manifest itself in external acts ; there is a silent activity of speculative thought which in the highest sense may be called action, though it never utters itself in deed. But the action of the drama cannot consist in an inward activity that does not pass beyond the region of thought or emotion. Even where the main interest is centred in the internal conflict, this conflict must have its outward as well as its inward side : it must manifest itself in individual acts, in concrete relations with the world outside ; it must bring the agent into collision with other personalities. We therefore exclude from the province of the drama purely mental conflicts—action and reaction within the mind itself—such as are the solitary struggles of the ascetic, the artist, the thinker. These are dramatic only when they are brought into a plot which gives them significance, and by which they become links in a chain of great events.

Only certain kinds of character, therefore, are capable of dramatic treatment.<sup>1</sup> Character on its passive side, character expressing itself in passionate emotion and nothing more, is fit for lyrical poetry, but not for the drama. As action is the first necessity of the drama, so dramatic character has in it some vital and spontaneous force which can make and mould circumstances, which sets obstacles aside. It is of the battling, energetic type. The emotions must harden into will and the will express itself in deed. Much more rarely, as in Hamlet, can character become dramatic by an intellectual and masterly inactivity which offers resistance to the motives that prompt ordinary men to action. Events are then brought about, not by the free energy of will, but by acts, as it were, of arrested volition, by forces such as operate in the world of dreamland. There is in Hamlet a strenuous inaction, a not-acting, which is in itself a form of action. Characters such as this are not purely passive, they have an originating and resisting force of their own. Most, however, of Shakespeare's characters, like the heroes of the Greek drama, are strong and dominant natures, they are of a militant quality of mind. They put their whole selves, their whole force of thinking and of willing, into what they do. Nothing is more wonderful than the resistless impulse, the magnificent energy of will, with which a Macbeth or a Richard III. goes to meet his doom.

Plot, then, is not, as is sometimes said, a mere external, an accident of the inner life. In the action of the drama character is defined and revealed. The conception of the plot as a whole must be present in embryo to the poet's mind prior to the evolution of the parts ; the characters will grow and shape themselves out of the dramatic situation in conformity with the main design. In maintaining, however, that plot is the first essential of the drama, it is not implied that the plot must be complicated, that a difficult skein is tangled in order to excite curiosity, and unravelled again to relieve the feelings so excited. Neither in Aeschylus nor in Sophocles has plot for its own sake become a motive. Not even in the Oedipus Tyrannus, where the threads are more elaborately tangled and the texture of the plot is woven closer than in any other Greek tragedy, is dramatic complication an end in itself. The normal Greek tragedy is singularly simple in structure. We do not find, as in King Lear and elsewhere in the Shakespearian drama, two concurrent actions which are skilfully interwoven in order to lead up to a tragic end. Some of the greatest Greek plays are not only devoid of intricate plot, but present an unchanging situation. In the Prometheus there is no outward movement, the main situation is at the end what it was at the beginning: the mental attitude of the hero is fixed and immovable, while a series of interlocutors come and go. We see before us the conflict of two superhuman wills, neither of which can yield to the other. Yet the dialogue is not mere conversation. Each speech of Prometheus is a step in the action; each word he utters is equivalent to a deed; it is the authentic voice of will which rises superior to physical bondage. The play is action throughout,—action none the less real because it consists not in outward doing. The reproach of want of movement which has been brought against the Prometheus has been also urged against Milton's Samson Agonistes. It is a drama, says Dr. Johnson, 'in which the intermediate parts have neither cause nor consequence, neither hasten nor retard the catastrophe.' Here again, however, a somewhat similar criticism is applicable. The speeches of Samson form an integral part of the action. The will-power which utters itself, in

We must hold, then, with Aristotle that plot or action is the primary element in the artistic structure of the drama. But the case also presents another side, which is lightly touched by him, and which deserves to be made more prominent. Briefly stated it is this. The action which springs out of character, and reflects character, alone satisfies the higher dramatic conditions.

Here there is a marked difference between epic and dramatic poetry. The epic poem relates a great and complete action which attaches itself to the fortunes of a people, or to the destiny of mankind, and which sums up the life of a period. The story and the deeds of those who pass across its wide canvas are linked with the larger movement of which the men themselves are but a part. The particular action rests upon forces outside itself. The hero is swept into the tide of events. The hairbreadth escapes, the surprises, the episodes, the marvellous incidents of epic story, only partly depend on the spontaneous energy of the hero.

The tragic drama, on the other hand, represents the destiny of the individual man. Action and character are here more closely intertwined. Even if the connexion cannot be traced in every detail, it is generally manifest when we look to the whole tenor of the play. The action is the product of the characters and of the circumstances in which they are placed. It is but seldom that outward circumstances are entirely dominant over the forces of the spirit. If it is true that 'things outward do draw the inward quality after them,' it is no less true in tragedy that things inward draw the outward after them. The outer and the inner world are here in nearer correspondence and equivalence than in any other form of poetry. The element of chance is all but eliminated. An inner bond of probability or necessity binds events together. This inevitable sequence of cause and effect is the link that character forges as it expresses itself in action. A man's deeds become external to him; his character dogs and pursues him as a thing apart. The fate that overtakes the hero is no alien thing, but his own self recoiling upon him for good or evil. 'Man's character,' as Heraclitus said, 'is his destiny' (ἡθος ἰνθρώπου δαίμων). To this vital relation between action and character is due the artistically compacted plot, the central unity of a tragedy. If, as Aristotle says, tragedy is a picture of life, it is of life rounded off, more complete, more significant, than any ordinary human life; revealing in itself the eternal law of things, summing up as in a typical example the story of human vicissitudes.

The dissent from Aristotle's doctrine that plot is the primary element in tragedy, is sometimes expressed in a modified form. Plot, it is admitted, was the primary element in the ancient drama; but, it is urged, the ancient drama was a drama of destiny; it obliterated character, while in the modern drama action is subordinate to character. Such is the view that De Quincey maintains. Man, he says, being the 'puppet of fate could not with any effect display what we call a character'; for the will which is 'the central pivot of character was obliterated, thwarted, cancelled by the dark fatalism which brooded over the Grecian stage.' 'Powerful and elaborate character . . . would have been wasted, nay would have been defeated and interrupted by the blind agencies of fate.' Hence, as he argues, the Greek drama presents grand situations but no complex motives; statue-like groups of tragic figures, but little play of human passion; 'no struggle internal or external.'

It is strange that the Greeks of all people, and Aeschylus of all poets, should have been accused of depriving man of free agency and making him the victim of a blind fate. The central lesson of the Aeschylean drama is that man is the master of his own destiny: nowhere is his spiritual freedom more vigorously asserted.<sup>1</sup>

The retribution which overtakes him is not inflicted at the hands of cruel or jealous powers. It is the justice of the gods, who punish him for rebellion against their laws. In ancient tragedy, the supernatural forces that order man's outward fortunes are, it is true, more visible than in the modern drama, but character is not obliterated, nor free personality effaced. The tragic action is no mere series of external incidents; it is a struggle of moral forces, the resultant of contending wills, —though a supreme necessity may guide the movement of events to unexpected issues. Plot does not overpower character; it is the very medium through which character is discerned, the touchstone by which its powers are tested.

Yet there is a certain sense in which we may say that the modern drama lays increased stress on the delineation of individual character. On the Greek stage the development of character was impeded by the unpliant material with which the tragedian had to work. By consecrated usage he was confined to a circle of legends whose main outlines were already fixed. These had come down from a remote past and bore traces of the rude times which had given them birth. The heroic legends of Greece were woven into the texture of national life: they appealed to the people by many associations, by local worships and familiar representations of art. Epic story, however, had in it elements which the purer and more reflective morality of the Periclean age was constrained to reject. The traditional legends had to be adapted, as best they might, to the new ethical ideals.

In carrying out this task the poets were limited by the possibilities of the plot. The great facts of the legends could not be set aside. The audience, familiar with their own heroic history, were not prepared for bold surprises. So far as the delineation of character itself was concerned, the utmost freedom of invention was allowed; the same dramatist might in successive tragedies exhibit a single person under various and inconsistent types of character. The point at which ethical portraiture was hampered was when the dramatic persons had to be fitted harmoniously into the framework of a particular plot. The details of the story might vary within wide limits, but the end was a thing given; and in the drama the end cannot but dominate the structure of the whole,—incidents and character alike. The weakness of the Dénouement, as compared with the complication, of many Greek tragedies is the direct result of the controlling tradition of the plot.

Though the poets handled the myths freely, often transforming the inner spirit and meaning of the tale, yet they could not quite overcome the inherent difficulties presented by the problem.

Aeschylus and Sophocles succeeded in deepening and humanising the archaic stories, and in liberating the characters from the influence of the past. But in Euripides the strain has become too great. The tissue of the material yields ; the old and the new world start asunder, the actions done belonging to the older order of things, the characters portrayed being the children of the poet's own generation.

The freedom of the Greek poet in delineating character was thus restricted by the choice of subject matter. Add to this another consideration. The themes usually handled were simple in outline, the main issues were clear and free from the disturbing accidents of individuality. In the legends selected the working of the eternal laws which govern human life could be visibly discerned. The dramatic characters were of corresponding simplicity. Their personality was seized by the immediate intuition of the poet at some decisive moment of action. A small portion was carved out of their career, illustrating human life in one of its typical aspects. Aeschylus, at once poet and prophet, sets forth in dramatic form the conflict between opposing principles,—between the implacable vengeance of an early age and the mercy which tempers justice, as in the Eumenides : or again, as in the Prometheus, he takes us back to a far-off past, and depicts the strife between two antagonists, each of them divine, who are representative of different dispensations, and hints at a future harmony, when divine Might should no longer be divorced from Wisdom and Benevolence. Sophocles, too, brings rival principles into collision. In the Antigone the divine and the human law stand opposed, and the religious duty towards the family triumphs over the claims of civic obedience. In the Philoctetes, the instincts of natural truthfulness finally carry the day against diplomatic falsehood for the public good.

Greek Tragedy, in its most characteristic examples, dramatises not the mere story of human calamities, but the play of great principles, the struggle between contending moral forces. The heroes are themselves the concrete embodiment of these forces. Religion, the State, the Family,—these were to a Greek the higher and enduring realities, the ideal ends for which he lived. Hence in the Greek drama, patriotism, wifely or sisterly devotion, all those elementary emotions which cluster round home and country, are the motives which chiefly impel to action and call forth the ardour of self-sacrifice. Seldom, at least in the older tragedians, do passions purely personal animate these tragic heroes: they are free from inward discord and self-contradiction: the ends they pursue are objective and rest on a belief in the abiding reality of the social organism.

The characters hereby gain universal meaning and validity: they are not of their own age and country only, but can claim kinship with mankind.

The modern drama introduces us into another world of poetic emotion. A richer and more varied inner life is opened up. The sense of personality is deepened. Even the idiosyncrasies of human nature become material to the dramatist. In Shakespeare character assumes inexhaustible variety. Its aspects are for ever changing, discordant elements meet and are blended. The contradictions do not easily yield to psychological analysis; we seek to explain them, but we find ourselves dealing only with abstractions. Not until the persons enact their story before us, and are seen in the plenitude of organic life, do we feel that they are possible and real creations. The discovery of unsuspected depths in human nature has brought into prominence the subjective side of ethical portraiture and subjective modes of viewing life. Love, honour, ambition, jealousy are the prevailing motives of modern tragedy; and among these love, the most exclusive of all the passions, dominates all other motives.

Shakespeare in deepening the subjective personality of man does not, however, lose sight of the objective ends of life and of the corresponding phases of character. Between these two sides of human experience he maintains a just balance. The particular emotions he stamps, as did the Greeks, with the impress of the universal. Nor does he permit the dramatised action to become subservient to the portrayal of individual character. Other poets, who have explored, though less profoundly, the recesses of human nature, and reproduced the rarer and more abnormal states of feeling, have been unable to rise above the pathological study of man,—a study as dangerous as it is fascinating to the dramatist. Indeed the conscious analysis of character and motive, even where the study of morbid conditions is not added, has marred the dramatic effect of many modern productions. Goethe with all his poetic genius did not surmount this danger. His reflective, emotional characters, who view life through the medium of individual feeling, seldom have the energy of will requisite to carry out a tragic action. They are described by the mouth of others, they express themselves in lyrical utterances of incomparable beauty. But the result is that where Shakespeare would have given us historical dramas, Goethe gives only dramatic biographies. And, in general, the modern introspective habit, the psychological interest felt in character, has produced many dramatic lyrics, but few dramas.

The increased emphasis attaching to individual portraiture is seen again in the tendency of the romantic drama to exhibit character in growth,— in each successive stage of its evolution. A Greek tragedy takes a few significant scenes out of the hero's life; these are bound together by a causal chain and constitute a single and impressive action. Much that the moderns would include in the play itself is placed outside the drama, and forms a groundwork of circumstances, antecedent to the action but necessary to explain it. Frequently the whole action of a Greek drama would form merely the climax of a modern play. The Greek custom of representing four dramas in a day placed a natural limit on the length of each play and on the range of the action. The romantic drama aimed at a more comprehensive representation; a single play in its scope and compass approached to the dimensions of a Trilogy. Sir Philip Sidney gently ridicules the quickened pace with which time is compelled to move, in order to condense into a few hours the events of as many years. 'Now of time they are more liberall, for ordinary it is that two young Princes fall in love. After many traverces, she is got with childe, delivered of a faire boy, he is lost, groweth a man, falls in love, and is ready to get another child, and all this in two hours' space.'

The dramatic theme is frequently enlarged in modern tragedy so that the entire process may be traced, from the moment when a deed lies dormant as a germ in the mind, till it has matured into action and unfolded itself in all its consequences. As the period embraced by the action is extended, and the relations with the outer world become more complex, it is only natural that the characters should expand in new directions and undergo essential changes. A wider range was here opened up for dramatic portraiture. It was not, of course, an untried region of art. The Greeks had exhibited character as moulded by the plot and developed, under pressure from without, or through impulses which operated from within. Indeed every drama must, in some measure, show the play and counter-play of those forces which rule the outer and the inner world. The process by which feeling is consolidated into a deed cannot but leave its mark on the mind of the agent. Antigone suffers the natural reaction from high-strained emotion. Neoptolemus becomes a changed person in the progress of the action, though the change is merely to restore him to his true self, which for the moment he had lost. Even Prometheus, grand in his immobility, is in some sense worked upon by the persons and the scenes which pass before him. His will, unconquerable from the first, expresses itself in tones still more defiant at the close.

In all these instances we have character in process of becoming. Wherever, in short, an action grows and expands according to dramatic laws, character, or at least feeling, must move in concert with it. But the extent to which growth and movement in the character accompany the march of the action is very various. The ancient stage furnishes us with no such complete instance of character-development as we have, for example, in Macbeth. It is the peculiar delight of the moderns to follow the course of such an evolution, to be present at the determining moment of a man's career, to watch the dawning of a passion, the shaping of a purpose, and to pursue the deed to its final accomplishment. We desire not only to know what a man was, and how he came to be it, but to be shown each step in the process, each link in the chain; and we are the more interested if we find that the gradual course of the dramatic movement has wrought a complete change in the original character. In this sense we may admit that the modern drama has brought the delineation of character into new and stronger relief.

But when we have taken into account all the minor variations of structure which the modern drama has undergone; when we have allowed for the greater complexity of the plot, the greater prominence given to the more subjective and individual aspects of character, the deeper interest taken in the unfolding of character and in its manifold developments; yet plot and character, in their essential relation, still hold the place sketched for them in the Poetics, and assigned to them on the Greek stage. Plot is artistically the first necessity of the drama. For the drama, in its true idea, is a poetical representation of a complete and typical action, whose lines converge on a determined end ; which evolves itself out of human emotion and human will in such a manner that action and character are each in turn the outcome of the other.

Such a drama was the creation of Greece, and of all her creations perhaps the greatest. Epic and lyric poetry have everywhere sprung up independently. Dramatic spectacles, religious or secular, are found in every country, and at all periods of civilisation. Dramatic narratives, such as the Book of Job, dramatic lyrics, such as the Song of Solomon, are among the forms of composition which meet us in the Old Testament. Lyrical dramas, which in their constituent elements recall the first beginnings of the Greek drama, have existed in China and Japan. India has produced vast poems which pass under the name of dramas, but which want both the unity of action and the spiritual freedom which the drama proper implies. The Greek drama is the harmonious fusion of two elements which never before had been perfectly blended. Lyrical in its origin, epic in the nature of its materials, it is at once an expression of passionate feeling and the story of an action ; it embodies emotion, but an emotion which grows into will and issues in deeds. If the lyrical utterance of feeling had remained the dominant, as it was the original, element in a Greek tragedy, it would have been left for some other people to create the tragic drama. As it was, the Greeks fixed unalterably its distinctive form and the artistic principle of its structure.

CHAPTER X

THE GENERALISING POWER OF COMEDY

POETRY, we say—following Aristotle—is an expression of the universal element in human life; or, in equivalent modern phrase, it idealises life. Now the word ‘idealise’ has two senses, which have given rise to some confusion. Writers on aesthetics generally mean by it the representation of an object in its permanent and essential aspects, in a form that answers to its true idea; disengaged from the passing accidents that cling to individuality, and from disturbing influences that obscure the type. What is local or transient is either omitted or reduced to subordinate rank; the particular is enlarged till it broadens out into the human and the universal. In this sense ‘the ideal’ is ‘the universal’ of the Poetics. But there is another and more popular use of the term, by which an idealised representation implies not only an absence of disturbing influences in the manifestation of the idea, but a positive accession of what is beautiful. The object is seized in some happy and characteristic moment, its lines of grace or strength are more firmly drawn, its beauty is heightened, its significance increased, while the likeness to the original is retained. The two senses of the word coincide in the higher regions of art. When the subject matter of artistic representation already possess a grandeur or dignity of its own, its dominant characteristics will be made more prominent by the suppression of accidental features, and the ideal form that results will have added elements of beauty. The leading characters in tragedy, while true to human nature, stand out above the common man in stature and nobility, just as, by the art of the portrait-painter, a likeness is reproduced and yet idealised.<sup>1</sup> In the very act of eliminating the accidental a higher beauty and perfection are discovered than was manifested in the world of reality. Tragedy, therefore, in the persons of its heroes combines both kinds of idealisation; it universalises, and in so doing it embellishes.

Idealised portraiture does not, as has been already observed,<sup>2</sup> consist in presenting characters of flawless virtue. Aristotle's tragic hero, as delineated in the Poetics (ch. xiii.), is by no means free from faults or failings. The instance, again, of Achilles as a poetic type of character, who in spite of defects has a moral nobility entitling him to rank as ideal, shows that the idealising process, as understood by Aristotle, does not imply the omission of all defects.<sup>1</sup> In general it may be said that some particular quality or group of qualities must be thrown into relief; some commanding faculty heightened, provided that in so doing the equipoise of character which constitutes a typical human being, is not disturbed. The ideal is that which is raised above the trivial and accidental; by virtue of a universal element which answers to the true idea of the object it transcends the limitations of the individual. Even vicious characters are not entirely excluded from tragedy on Aristotle's theory,<sup>2</sup> though the villain may not hold the position of protagonist. The saying attributed to Sophocles, αὐτὸς μὲν οἷους δεῖ ποιεῖν, Εὐριπίδην δὲ οἷοι εἰσὶ, does not bear the interpretation sometimes assigned to it, that the characters of Sophocles are patterns of heroic goodness, while those of Euripides are the men and women of real life.<sup>3</sup> The meaning is that the characters of Sophocles answer to the higher dramatic requirements; they are typical of universal human nature in its deeper and abiding aspects; they are ideal, but ideally human; whereas Euripides reproduced personal idiosyncrasies and the trivial features of everyday reality.

Objection may be taken to the distinction drawn between the two meanings of the word 'idealise,' on the ground that they run into one another and fundamentally mean the same thing. It may be urged that so far as an object assumes its universal form, ridding itself of non-essentials, it will stand out in perfect beauty; for all ugliness, all imperfection, all evil itself, is an accident of nature, a derangement and disturbance by which things fall short of their true idea. To sent them,' 'men as they ought to be drawn.' In the first edition I inclined to the latter view.

The general context, however, and the equivalent phrases in this chapter (οἷα εἶναι δεῖ § 1, <ὥς> δεῖ § 6, βέλτιον § 7, πρὸς τὸ βέλτιον § 17) point strongly to the first interpretation. It has in its favour this further fact (as is justly observed by Mr. R. C. Seaton, Classical Review, vol. xi. No. 6), that the saying of Sophocles is thus couched in a less arrogant form. Accepting this view we must explain οἷους δεῖ (and similarly <ὥς> δεῖ § 6) as a kind of shorthand expression used, with more than Aristotelian brevity and disregard of grammar, to denote the ideal in poetry.

Even if εἶναι is to be understood with δεῖ, the δεῖ will still be the 'ought' of aesthetic obligation, not the moral 'ought.' It has been previously shown, however, that the aesthetic ideal of character in the Poetics implies a high, though not a perfect morality.

represent the universal would thus in its ultimate analysis imply the representation of the object in the noblest and fairest forms in which it can clothe itself according to artistic laws. Comedy, which concerns itself with the follies and foibles, the flaws and imperfections of mankind, cannot on this reasoning idealise or universalise its object.

Now, it may or may not be that evil or imperfection can be shown to be a necessary and ultimate element in the universe; but the point seems to be one for philosophy to discuss, not for art to assume. Art, when it seeks to give a comprehensive picture of human life, must accept such flaws as belong to the normal constitution of man. At what precise point imperfections are to be regarded as accidental, abnormal, irregular; as presenting so marked a deviation from the type as to be unworthy of lasting embodiment in art, is a problem whose answer will vary at different stages of history, and will admit of different applications according to the particular art that is in question. Certain imperfections, however, will probably always be looked on as permanent features of our common humanity. With these defects comedy amuses itself, discovering the inconsistencies which underlie life and character, and exhibiting evil not as it is in its essential nature, but as a thing to be laughed at rather than hated. Thus limiting its range of vision, comedy is able to give artistic expression to certain types of character which can hardly find a place in serious art.

Again, it must not be forgotten that the individual character, considered by itself, is not the same as this character considered in its place in the drama. A character universalised may, if regarded alone, still be 'ugly,' and yet it may contribute to the beauty of the whole. In that sense we can continue to call it 'ugly' only by a kind of abstraction. Or to put it otherwise,—evil regarded in its essential nature may be ugly; but, shown in the action of the comedy to be nugatory and ridiculous, it ceases to be ugly; it is an element in a fact which is beautiful.

Aristotle draws no distinction between the universality which is proper to tragedy and comedy respectively. Each of these, as a branch of the poetic art, embodies the type rather than the individual, and to this extent they have a common function.

An Athenian of the fifth century would hardly have singled out comedy as an example of poetic generalisation. The large admixture of personal satire in the old Attic comedy would rather have suggested the view that the main ingredient in comic mirth is the malicious pleasure afforded by the discomfiture of another. And, in fact, Plato, in the subtle analysis he gives in the Philebus<sup>1</sup> of the emotions excited by comedy, proceeds on some such assumption. The pleasure of the ludicrous springs, he says, from the sight of another's misfortune, the misfortune, however, being a kind of self-ignorance that is powerless to inflict hurt. A certain malice is here of the essence of comic enjoyment. Inadequate as this may be, if taken as a complete account of the ludicrous, it nevertheless shows a profound insight into some of the chief artistic modes of its manifestation. Plato anticipates, but goes deeper than Hobbes, whose well-known words are worth recalling: 'The passion of laughter is nothing else but a sudden glory, arising from a sudden conception of some eminency in ourselves, by comparison of the infirmity of others or with our own formerly.'

The laughter that has in it a malicious element, and that implies in some sense the abasement of another, does not satisfy Aristotle's conception of the idea of the ludicrous. His definition in the Poetics<sup>1</sup> carries the analysis a step farther than it had been carried by Plato. 'The ludicrous,' he says, 'consists in some defect or ugliness which is not painful or destructive. To take an obvious example, the comic mask is ugly and distorted, but does not imply pain.' The phrase 'not painful or destructive'—either, that is, to the object of laughter, or sympathetically to the subject—is a remarkable contribution to the idea under discussion. Still more significant is the omission of malice, which to Plato had seemed an essential ingredient.

The pleasure, therefore, of the pure ludicrous is not to be explained, as some tell us to-day, by the disinterested delight of primitive man in the infliction of suffering. It does not consist in a gratified feeling of malignity, softened indeed by civilisation, but ultimately to be resolved into a kind of savage mirth. A good joke becomes, indeed, a little more pungent if it is seasoned with malice, but, even without the malice, laughter may be provoked. And, according to Aristotle, the quality that provokes laughter is a certain 'ugliness,' a 'defect' or 'deformity.' These words, primarily applicable to the physically ugly, the disproportionate, the unsymmetrical, will include the frailties, follies, and infirmities of human nature, as distinguished from its graver vices or crimes. Further, taking account of the elements which enter into the idea of beauty in Aristotle, we shall probably not unduly strain the meaning of the expression, if we extend it to embrace the incongruities, absurdities, or cross-purposes of life, its blunders and discords, its imperfect correspondences and adjustments, and that in matters intellectual as well as moral.

exactness; for though the ludicrous is always incongruous, yet the incongruous (even limited as it is here) is not always ludicrous. Incongruity, in order to be ludicrous, requires a transition, a change of mood, resulting in the discovery either of an unexpected resemblance where there was unlikeness, or of an unexpected unlikeness where there was resemblance. There is always a blending of contrasted feelings. The pleasure of the ludicrous thus arises from the shock of surprise at a painless incongruity. It sometimes allies itself with malice, sometimes with sympathy, and sometimes again is detached from both. For our present purpose, however, it is enough to note that, although Aristotle's definition is hardly complete, it has the merit of recognising the pure ludicrous, which is awakened by the perception of incongruity, and provokes no malignant or triumphant laughter. The definition harmonises well with his exclusion of personal satire and galling caricature from genuine comedy, and with his theory of the generalising power of poetry.

Indeed, Aristotle selects comedy as a salient illustration of what he means by the representation of the universal.<sup>1</sup> If I understand him aright he

I have ventured to admit into the text my conjecture οὐ points to the tendency shown in comedy to discard the use of historical names and adopt names which are suggestive of character or occupation or 'humours'.<sup>4</sup> It was part of the effort, which, as he says, poetry makes to express the universal. The name had only to be heard in order that the type to which the person belonged might be recognised; much in (or οὐχί) τὰ τυχόντα for οὕτω τὰ τυχόντα of the MSS.: 'the plot is first constructed; then characteristic or appropriate names are affixed.' (For οὐ τὰ τυχ. cf. Poet. vii. 4, xxvi. 7, Pol. v. (viii.) 5. 1339 b 32, οὐ τὴν τυχοῦσαν ἡδονήν.) The Arabic version which has a negative ('nequaquam,' Margoliouth) instead of οὕτω supports the correction. By a similar error in this very chapter, ix. 2. 1451 a 37, A<sup>c</sup> gives οὕτω where the apographa rightly read οὐ τό.

The thought of the passage will, with the correction, be of this kind: "It is at this universality that poetry aims when she attaches names to the characters, i.e. when instead of adopting historical names (γενόμενα ὀνόματα) she gives names of her own invention (cf. § 6 πεποιημένα). The names in that case are expressive; they indicate that the person is not an individual but a type. This generalising tendency, which has been counteracted in tragedy, has become apparent in the development of comedy.' Plato in the Cratylus pp. 392-5 goes far beyond this. By a series of fanciful etymologies he professes to discover an inner correspondence between the names of various tragic heroes and their characters or fortunes.

It is not quite clear whether the reference in ἡδη τοῦτο δῆλον γέγονεν is to the comedy of Aristotle's own day or is meant to include all the developed forms of comedy. The contrast drawn between the practice of οἱ ἰαμβοποιοί (cf. v. 3, Κράτης . . . ἰκφόμενος τῆς ἰαμβικῆς ἰδέας) and the new tendency points rather to the wider reference. Since comedy passed beyond the lampooning stage, the movement towards generalisation has been perceptible.

(1) Names, etymologically significant, such as Dicaeopolis, Euelpides, the same way as in the New Comedy the Boor, the Parasite, and other types were known on the stage by their familiar masks. It may be added that not the names only of the characters, but the extant titles of plays composed by writers of the Middle Comedy, imply the same effort after generalisation. They remind us of the character-

Peithetaerus, Phidippides in the Aristophanic comedy, coexisting side by side with real names (Socrates, Cleon, etc.), which were a survival of the λαμβικὴ ἰδέα. On this model probably Plautus coined his Bombomachides, Polymachaeroplages, Pyrgopolynes (cf. also Αἰρησιεύχης in Diphylus) and the like. Of a tamer kind but still of the same class are the names of soldiers of fortune in Menander, Thrasonides (in the Μισοῦμενος), Bias (in the Κόλαξ), Polemon (in the Περικειρόμενος), and Thrasyleon.

(2) Names which, being appropriated by usage to certain parts, designated occupation or condition, e.g. Ξανθίας, Μανῆς (in Pherecrates, Alexis, etc. as well as in Aristophanes), Ιππίας, Μαρία, all slave-names. Similarly in Plautus, many of the names of meretrices, Philematium, Glycerium, Palaestra, etc., come pretty certainly from writers of the New Comedy. Such names were employed in ordinary life, to judge from Athenaeus (xiii. 583 D ff.). Again, Plautus and Terence agree in using Chremes, Callidemides, Cratinus, Demipho, etc. for senes, and Charinus, Pamphilus for adulescentes.

In Plautus the number of names etymologically significant and appropriate largely preponderates over the non-significant; in Terence the proportion is the other way. In arguing back from the usage of Plautus and Terence to Greek originals much caution has to be observed. In Plautus, for instance, there are some five hundred names which have a Greek appearance (Rassow, De Plauti substantiis, Leipzig 1881), but many of these are of a mongrel formation. Terence's names are for the most part good Attic names and were probably more or less associated with stock characters in the New Comedy. Unfortunately the fragments of Attic Comedy (Middle and New) furnish us with a very scanty sketches of Theophrastus. Such are 'the Peevish man' (ὁ Δύσκολος), 'the Fault-finder' (ὁ Μεμφίμοιρος), 'the Busybody' (ὁ Πολυπράγμων), 'the Boor' (ὁ Ἀγροίκος), 'the Hermit' (ὁ Μονότροπος). Other pieces again bear the name of a profession or occupation, as 'the Boxer' (ὁ Πύκτης), 'the Charioteer' (ὁ Ἡνίοχος), 'the Soldier' (ὁ Στρατιώτης), 'the Painter' (ὁ Ζωγράφος); and others are called after a people,—'the Thessalians,' 'the Thebans,' 'the Corinthians,'—and may be assumed, incidentally at least, to portray or satirise national characteristics.

In various places Aristotle indicates the distinction between comedy proper, which playfully supply of names on which to rest our conclusions. The Γεωργός of Menander contains no names etymologically appropriate to the characters, though Δάος and Συρός are stock slaves' names, familiar to us from Terence.

The following passage from Donatus on Ter. Ad. 1, which well illustrates οὐ τὰ τυχόντα ὀνόματα of the first class above mentioned: 'nomina personarum, in comoediis dumtaxat, habere debent rationem et etymologiam; etenim absurdum est comicum aperte argumenta confingere, vel nomen personae incongruum dare, vel officium quod sit a nomine diversum.'

If the MSS. reading is retained the passage will run thus:—'In the case of comedy this is already clear: the writers first construct their plots . . . and then, and not till then (οὕτω), affix such names as first come to hand' (τὰ τυχόντα ὀνόματα being opposed to τὰ γεγόμενα ὀνόματα). The names are given at haphazard; they are not as in primitive comedy and tragedy tied down to any historical personage,—not limited by association with any known individual; and this fact serves to bring out the generality of the action. The connexion between τὰ τυχόντα and the καθόλου on this interpretation is somewhat forced, though not impossible.

touches the faults and foibles of humanity, and personal satire (ἡ ἰαμβικὴ ἰδέα)<sup>1</sup> or invective (λοιδορία). The one kind of composition is a representation of the universal, the other of the particular. He does not expressly mention Aristophanes in this connexion; but in the Ethics, the old political comedy of Athens is contrasted with the Middle Comedy as employing coarse or abusive language (αἰσχρολογία), instead of delicate innuendo (ὑπόνοια).<sup>2</sup> Aristotle himself manifestly prefers the comedy from which personalities are banished and which presents generalised types of character in conformity with the fundamental laws of poetry.

It is doubtful whether Aristotle had any perception of the genius and imaginative power of Aristophanes. The characters of the Aristophanic drama are not fairly judged if they are thought of simply as historical individuals, who are subjected to a merciless caricature. Socrates, Cleon, Euripides are types which represent certain movements in philosophy, politics, and poetry. They are labelled with historic names; a few obvious traits are borrowed which recall the well-known personalities; but the dramatic personages are in no sense the men who are known to us from history. Such poetic truth as they possess is derived simply from their typical quality. It is not, indeed, in the manner of Aristophanes to attempt any faithful portraiture of life or character. His imagination works by giving embodiment to what is abstract. His love of bold personification is in part inherited from his predecessors on the Attic stage: Cratinus had introduced Laws (Νόμοι) and Riches (Πλούτοι) as his choruses. But Aristophanes goes farther; he seems to think through materialised ideas. He personifies the Just and the Unjust Logic, and brings them before us as lawcourt disputants; he incarnates a metaphor such as the philosopher 'in the clouds,' the jurymen with waspish temper, mankind with their airy hopes. The same bent of mind leads him to give a concrete form to the forces and tendencies of the age, and to embody them in actual persons. A play of Aristophanes is a dramatised debate, an ἀγών, in which the persons represent opposing principles; for in form the piece is always combative, though the fight may be but a mock fight. These principles are brought into collision and worked out to their most irrational conclusions, little regard being paid to the coherence of the parts and still less to propriety of character. The Aristophanic comedy, having transported real persons into a world where the conditions of reality are neglected, strips them of all that is truly individual and distinctive, it invests them with the attributes of a class or makes them representative of an idea.

In the Middle Comedy and still more in the New Comedy we observe a change in the manner of poetic generalisation. We quit the fantastic world of Aristophanes with its audacious allegories and grotesque types of character. There is now a closer study of real life and a finer delineation of motive. The action by degrees gains strength and consistency, till, like that of tragedy, it has a beginning, a middle, and an end. Character and action become more intimately united. The typical follies and failings of mankind are woven into a plot, in which moral probability takes the place of the arbitrary sequence of loosely connected scenes and incidents. The broad characteristics of humanity receive a more faithful, if a more prosaic rendering. Moreover, the great ideas of Hellenism disengage themselves from local and accidental influences and make their appeal to a universal human sentiment. In Aristotle's day the movement here described was but partially developed. He did not live to see the masterpieces of Menander, which were the poetic embodiment of his own theory. The Middle Comedy which suggested to him his ideal had not indeed altogether dropped the element of personal satire; it merely replaced the invective formerly levelled against public men by a gentle raillery of poets and philosophers. Still Aristotle discerned accurately the direction in which comedy was travelling, and not improbably contributed by his reasoned principles and precepts to carry forward the literary movement already initiated.

We have seen that in the Poetics (ch. ix.) he draws no distinction between the generalisation proper to tragedy and comedy respectively. It is an important omission, though in a treatise so incomplete as the Poetics, in which we have a bare fragment of the section devoted to comedy, we are hardly warranted in assuming that he saw no difference in this respect between the two forms of poetry. Yet critics give ingenious reasons for what they conceive to be the orthodox Aristotelian view. Lessing, to whom Aristotle's authority was that of a lawgiver in art,<sup>1</sup> and who admits that he considers the Poetics 'as infallible as the Elements of Euclid,' having once satisfied himself that Aristotle had pronounced upon the matter in dispute, enforces at length the conclusion that the characters in comedy are 'general,' precisely in the same sense as those of tragedy.<sup>1</sup> He controverts the saying of Diderot that 'comedy has species, tragedy has individuals,' and the similar observation of Hurd that 'comedy makes all characters general, tragedy particular.'<sup>2</sup>

But, surely, there is a real distinction between the generalisation of tragedy and of comedy, though it is not exactly expressed in the sayings above quoted. Comedy looking at a single aspect of life, at the follies, the imperfections, the inconsistencies of men, withdraws its attention from the graver issues which concern the end of conduct. It takes those moments when life appears to be idle and distorted, a thing of vanity and nothingness; it brings out its negative side, its inherent limitations; it exhibits situations in which the sense of the ideal is lost under an outward gaiety, or its realisation wholly frustrated. It does not detach the essentials of life from the unreal appearances; and, though some elements of tragic earnestness may underlie the representation, comedy cannot, while remaining within its own strict limits, present, as tragedy does, a rounded and complete action, an image of universal human nature. In respect of character-drawing, its usual method—so far as it maintains itself as a distinct artistic type—is to embody a dominant characteristic or a lead-

A character so created, exhibiting an ideal of covetousness, misanthropy, or whatever the quality may be, almost of necessity runs to caricature. It is framed on lines of impossible simplicity. The single quality, which in nature is organically related to other impulses and powers, is isolated and exaggerated. The process is one of abstraction, and corresponds to an original one-sidedness in the comic view of life. Even Molière in Tartuffe and Alceste portrays abstract qualities rather than living men. Not that comedy in its generalising effort suppresses particulars. No detail is too trivial for it, no utterance too momentary, no desires too purely goistic, if only they can be made to serve the general effect; but the details it accentuates are of a different kind from those which tragedy admits. In the passing and unreal appearances of life it finds everywhere material for mirth. In a sense it individualises everything, no less truly than in another sense it generalises all. What it can rarely achieve as a purely sportive activity is to combine these two aspects in ethical portraiture.

The line that severs tragedy and comedy is not, indeed, so sharply drawn by modern dramatic art as it was in the ancient world; and characters have been created in which the serious and the comic element interpenetrate one another. By the close alliance of sympathy with humour—an alliance which was still imperfect in antiquity—the most far-reaching results have been produced affecting the range and meaning of the ludicrous. Humour, enriched by sympathy, directs its observation to the more serious realities of life. It looks below the surface, it rediscovers the hidden incongruities and deeper discords to which use and wont have deadened our perception. It finds everywhere the material both for laughter and tears; and pathos henceforth becomes the companion of humour. The humorist does not, like the satirist, stand apart from men in fancied superiority. He recognises his own kinship with the humanity which provokes him to mirth. He sees around him shattered ideals; he observes the irony of destiny; he is aware of discords and imperfections, but accepts them all with playful acquiescence, and is saddened and amused in turn. Humour is the meeting-point of tragedy and comedy; and the saying of Socrates in the Symposium has in great measure been justified, that the genius of tragedy and of comedy is the same.<sup>1</sup>

It is chiefly through humour of the deeper sort that modern comedy has acquired its generalising power. To the humorist there is no such thing as individual folly, but only folly universal in a world of fools. Humour annihilates the finite. As Coleridge says, 'The little is made great and the great little, in order to destroy both, because all is equal in contrast with the infinite.' Uncle Toby, in Tristram Shandy, with his campaigns and his fortresses, is an epitome of the follies of 'mankind. In the greatest creations of humour, such as Don Quixote, we have a summary of the contradictions of human life, of the disproportion between the idea and the fact, between soul and body, between the brilliant day-dream and the waking reality.

This universalising power of humour is not, indeed, unknown in ancient literature. The Birds of Aristophanes is a splendid example to the contrary. But, if we restrict our attention, as we have chiefly done here, to the portraiture of character that is individual while at the same time it is universal, we are at once aware of a distinction. Don Quixote and Sancho are living and breathing beings; each is a tissue of contradictions, yet each is a true personality. The actors in an Aristophanic play are transparent caricatures. In these 'half-grotesque impersonations the individual is entirely subordinated to the type; and not here only, but also—so far as we can judge—in the more minute and realistic art of the New Comedy, where differences of age, sex, family relationship, or social condition are carefully delineated, coexisting, however, with strongly marked features of a common humanity. Greek tragedy, on the other hand, like all tragedy of the highest order, combines in one harmonious representation the individual and the universal. Whereas comedy tends to merge the individual in the type, tragedy manifests the type through the individual. In brief, it may be said that comedy, in its unmixed sportive form, creates personified ideals, tragedy creates idealised persons.

POETIC UNIVERSALITY IN GREEK LITERATURE

It is characteristic of Aristotle's method that he starts from concrete facts, and that his rules are in the main a generalisation from these facts. He is, in the first instance, a Greek summing up Greek experience. The treasure-house of Greek art and poetry lay open before him ; a vast body of literature, lost to us, was in his hands. He looked back upon the past, conscious, it would seem, that the great creative era was closed, and that in the highest regions, at least, of artistic composition the Greek genius had reached the summit of its powers. The time was ripe for criticism to take a survey of the whole field of poetic literature. Aristotle approaches the subject as the historian of poetry, but his generalising faculty impels him to seek the law in the facts, and from the observed effects of different kinds of poetry to penetrate to the essential character of each. If his rules have proved in most cases to be not merely rules of Greek art but principles of art, it is because first, the Greek poets contain so much that appeals to universal human nature, and because next, Aristotle was able from the mass of literature before him to disengage and to formulate this universal element. The laws that he discovers are those which were already impressed on the chief productions of the Greek genius.

We can hardly claim, as has been sometimes done for Aristotle, that he rose above the traditions and limitations of the Hellenic mind, and took up the attitude of the purely human or cosmopolitan spectator. On some points, doubtless, he expresses opinions which contradict the current ideas of his age. He admits that in certain cases the tragic poet may take entirely fictitious subjects instead of the well-known legends.<sup>1</sup> He holds that metre, which was popularly thought to be the most essential element of poetry, is in truth the least essential, if indeed it is essential at all.<sup>2</sup> He leaves it at least an open question whether the drama may not still admit of new developments.<sup>3</sup> But in general it remains true that Greek experience was the starting-point and basis of his theory, though that experience had to be sifted, condensed, and interpreted before any coherent doctrine of poetry could be framed or judgment be passed on individual authors. Aristotle does not accept even the greater tragedians as all of equal authority, or all their works as alike canons of art; and it is a mistake to assume that the precepts of the Poetics must, if there is no indication to the contrary, harmonise with the practice of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, if not of minor writers also. His rules are based on a discriminating and selective principle, and imply some criterion for judging of artistic excellence.

The principles of art as laid down by Aristotle faithfully reflect the Greek genius in the exclusion of certain tendencies to which other nations have yielded. First, pure realism is forbidden; that is, the literal and prosaic imitation which reaches perfection in a jugglery of the senses by which the copy is mistaken for the original. In the decay of Greek art this kind of ingenuity came into vogue, but it never found favour in the best times. Even the custom of setting up votive statues of athletes who had been thrice victors in the games did not lead to a realism such as in Egypt was the outcome of the practice which secured the immortality of a dead man through the material support of a portrait statue. Next, pure symbolism is forbidden,—those fantastic shapes which attracted the imagination of Oriental nations, and which were known to the Greeks themselves in the arts of Egypt and Assyria. The body of a lion with the head of a man and the wings and feathers of a bird was an attempt to render abstract attributes in forms which do not correspond with the idea. Instead of the concrete image of a living organism the result is an impossible compound, which in transcending nature violates nature's laws. The Odyssey, on the other hand, with its impossible adventures by sea and land, its magic ship, its enchanted islands, its men transformed into swine, its vision of the world below, is constructed according to the laws of poetic truth. The whole is a faithful representation of human life and action, the irrational elements (τὰ ἄλογα) being but accessories that do not disturb the main impression. They are presented to the imagination with such vividness and coherence that the impossible becomes plausible, the fiction looks like truth.

That these principles were arrived at after due observation of Oriental art is very improbable. Familiar as Aristotle must have been with the external characteristics of this art, and with specimens of Greek workmanship which had been moulded under its influence, there is no express allusion to Eastern works of art in his writings. The omission is not explained simply by saying that he did not set himself the task of writing a treatise on sculpture, and that his sole concern was with poetry. For, had he given serious thought to the plastic art of the East, as he certainly did to that of his own country, some trace of it would probably have been found in his writings; just as his observation of Greek models led him to drop many detached remarks on painting and sculpture. To learn a barbarous tongue, however, was so uncongenial to a Greek that even the all-acquisitive mind of Aristotle was content to remain ignorant of every literature but his own; and it may similarly have seemed a waste of labour to study the symbolism of a barbarous art.<sup>1</sup> Oriental art on the face of it was not a rational and intelligent creation; it had no counterpart in the world of reality.

The Greek imagination of the classical age is under the strict control of reason, it is limited by a sense of measure and a faculty of self-restraint. It does not like the Oriental run riot in its own prodigal wealth. We are always conscious of a reserve of power, a temperate strength which knows its own resources and employs them without effort and without ostentation. The poet, the historian, the artist, each of them could do much more if he chose, but he does not care to dazzle us. He is bent on seeing truly, on seeing harmoniously, and on expressing what he sees. The materials on which his imagination works are fused and combined according to the laws of what is possible, reasonable, natural. Greek mythology as it has come to us in literature bears on it this mark of reasonableness. Traces indeed there are of an earlier type,—rude and unassimilated elements, flaws which have been left untouched by the shaping hand of the poet or by the constructive genius of the race. But compare Greek mythology with that of other nations, and we cannot but wonder at its freedom from the extravagant and grotesque. The Greeks in creating their gods in their own likeness followed that imperious instinct of their nature which required that every product of their minds should be a harmonious and intelligible creation, not a thing half in the world, half out of it, no hybrid compound of symbolic attributes.

<sup>1</sup> It is strange how little notice the Greeks took of symbolical art. Dion Chrysostom (circa A.D. 100), Ὀλυμπ. Or. xii. 404 B, in a speech put into the mouth of Phidias defends the plastic art of Greece, which expresses the divine nature in human form. The human body serves indeed as a symbol of the invisible, but it is a nobler symbolism than that of the barbarians, who in animal shapes discover the divine image. Philostratus Vit. Apoll. vi. 19 discusses the point at greater length. Apollonius is here supporting the method of Greek sculpture as contrasted with the grotesque forms under which the gods were represented in Egypt (ἄτοπα καὶ γελοῖα θεῶν εἶδη). Thespesion, with whom he is conversing, argues that the wisdom of the Egyptians is shown chiefly in this, that they give up the daring attempt directly to reproduce the deity, and by symbol and allegory produce a more impressive effect: σοφὸν γὰρ εἶπερ τι Αἰγυπτίων καὶ τὸ μὴ θρασύνεσθαι ἐς τὰ τῶν θεῶν εἶδη, ξυμβολικὰ δὲ αὐτὰ ποιεῖσθαι καὶ ὑπονοοίμενα, καὶ γὰρ ἄν καὶ σεμνότερα οὕτω φαίνοιντο. To which Apollonius replies that the effect would have been still more impressive if instead of fashioning a dog or goat or ibis they had offered no visible representation, and left it to the imagination, which is a better artist, to give form and shape to the divinity.

To watch the formation of the Homeric Olympus is to see the Greek mind working in its own artistic fashion. The several tribes,—Achaeans, Argives, Minyae, and a host of others,—have each their local gods and goddesses, uncharacterised, unspecialised, save by the vague omnipotence of godhead. With the victory of dominant races and the fusion of cults there came a redistribution of functions and attributes that might have issued in unmeaning chaos or in bare abstractions. Not so with the Greeks. From the motley assemblage of tribal divinities the Homeric gods stand out clear and calm as their own statues. The gods of other nations may be but the expression of the people's practical needs, or the abstracted utterance of their thought. The gods of the Greeks are fashioned by a race of artists in accordance with nature, but completing and transcending her. The mythologist notes how in the assignment of their spheres and duties all that is non-essential is eliminated. Attributes which a god already has in common with other gods fall out. The Homeric Olympus is a great gathering of living type-forms whose image henceforth haunted the imagination of the race.

It would not be true to say that the lighter play of fancy is excluded from the literature and mythology of the Greeks. Few nations have taken more delight in weaving airy and poetic fictions apart from all reality, made out of nothing and ending nowhere. Almost all the Greek poets have something of this national taste. It breaks out at moments even in the prose-writers, in Herodotus or Plato. In one domain, that of comedy, fancy seems at first sight to reign supreme and uncontrolled. It obeys its own laws and revels in its own absurdities. It turns the world upside down, and men and gods follow its bidding. The poet yields in thorough abandonment to the spirit of the festival, he leads the orgy and shares its madness and intoxication. No sooner is he launched on his course than he is carried wherever an exuberant poetic fancy and a gift of inextinguishable laughter lead him. The transitions from jest to earnest are as quick as thought. Whole scenes follow one another in which no single word can be taken seriously. Yet even comedy has its lucid intervals, or rather in its madness there is a method. In its wildest freaks there is some underlying reason, some intelligible drift and purpose. The fantastic license, however, of comedy stands alone in Greek literature. In other departments fancy is much more restrained, more reserved. It breaks through as a sudden and transient light, as gleams that come and go, it does not disturb the serenity of thought.

The Greeks themselves were accustomed to speak of poetic genius as a form of madness, an inspired enthusiasm. It is the doctrine of Plato in the Ion, in the Phaedrus, in the Symposium. Even Aristotle, who sometimes writes as if the faculty of the logician were enough to construct

<sup>2</sup> Poet. xvii. 2, διὸ εὐφροῦς ἡ ποιητικὴ ἐστὶν ἢ μανικοῦ· τούτων γὰρ οἱ μὲν εὐπλαστοὶ οἱ δὲ ἐκστατικοὶ εἰσιν. The reading ἐκστατικοὶ is found in one MS.: the others have ἐξεταστικοί. The correspondence of the two clauses is beyond doubt best maintained by reading ἐκστατικοί. Then, οἱ μὲν, i.e. the εὐφροεῖς, are εὐπλαστοί: the finely gifted natures, poets who have the veratility of genius, can take the mould of other characters: whereas οἱ δέ, i.e. the μανικοί, are ἐκστατικοί. If we keep ἐξεταστικοί, οἱ μὲν will refer to μανικοί, οἱ δέ to εὐφροεῖς. By ἐξεταστικοί will be meant a fine instinct of criticism, an artistic judgment, a delicate power of seizing resemblances and differences. In favour of this it may be argued that the εὐφροής has the special gift of a fine critical faculty: cf. Eth. Nic. iii. 5. 1114 b 6, ἀλλὰ φύναι δέι ὥσπερ ὄψιν ἔχοντα, ἧ κρινεῖ καλῶς . . . καὶ ἐστὶν εὐφροής ᾧ τοῦτο καλῶς πέφυκεν. But in either case the εὐφροής has a more conscious and critical faculty than the μανικός. The Arabic version, which at first seemed undecipherable, is now found to afford unquestionable confirmation of ἐκστατικοί: see Preface to this edition.

As a curious instance of perverted criticism, it is worth mentioning that Dryden (following Rapin), Preface to Troilus and Cressida, wished to read εὐφροῦς οὐ μανικοῦ, lest the 'madness of poetry' should be justified from the authority of Aristotle.

survive. Of the great poets of Greece, however, we can say with certainty that whatever was the exact nature of their madness, inspiration, ecstasy—call it what you will—they never released themselves from the sovereignty of reason. Capricious and inconsequent they were not. Their imaginative creations even in their most fantastic forms obeyed a hidden law.

Lamb's essay on 'The Sanity of True Genius' may be illustrated from Greek poetry as fitly as from Shakespeare. 'So far from the position holding true that great wit (or genius, in our modern way of speaking) has a necessary alliance with insanity, the greatest wits, on the contrary, will ever be found to be the sanest writers. . . . But the true poet dreams being awake. He is not possessed by his subject, but has dominion over it. . . . Where he seems most to recede from humanity he will be found the truest to it. From beyond the scope of Nature if he summon possible existences, he subjugates them to the law of her consistency. He is beautifully loyal to that sovereign directress, even when he appears most to betray and desert her.' The perfect sanity of the Greek genius is intimately connected with its universality. For is not insanity a kind of disordered individualism? The madman is an egoist; he takes his own fancies as the measure of all things. He does not correct his impressions, or compare them with those of others, or bring them into harmony with external fact. The test of a man's sanity is the relation in which his mind stands to the universal. We call a man sane when his ideas not only form a coherent whole in themselves, but fit in with the laws and facts of the outer world and with the universal human reason. Is not all this in keeping with Aristotle's theory that the effort of poetry is towards the universal; that it represents the permanent possibilities of human nature, the essentials rather than the accidents? The poet does not on the one hand create at random or by guesswork, nor yet does he merely record what has happened. He tells what may happen according to laws of internal probability or necessity. The sequence of poetry is not the empirical sequence of fact but the logical or conceivable sequence of ideas; it eliminates chance and discovers unity and significance in characters and events.

All great poetry and art fulfil this law of universality, but none perhaps so perfectly as the poetry and art of the Greeks. Take a single instance,—the delineation of female character in Greek poetry. The heroines of Homer and of the tragedians are broadly and unmistakably human. In real life woman is less individual than man; she runs less into idiosyncrasies, she conforms rather to the general type. This however, it may be said, is owing to the deference she pays to the conventional rules of society; it is due to artificial causes that do not reach to the foundations of character. But an inwardly eccentric woman is also rare. Go below the surface and you find that with all outward marks of difference, whether of fashion or of manner, and in spite of a caprice that has become proverbial, female character can be reduced to certain elemental types of womanhood. These essential types are few. Maiden, wife, mother, daughter, sister,—here are the great determining relations of life. They form the groundwork of character. Accident may modify character, circumstances may stamp it with a particular expression, and bring into relief this or that dominant feature. But there remains an ideal mould in which the type is cast. Once the deeper springs of feeling are moved, circumstances are thrust aside, and a woman's action may almost with certainty be predicted.

The superiority of the Greeks over all but the very greatest of the moderns in portraying female character, is probably due to their power of seizing and expressing the universal side of human nature—that side which is primary and fundamental in woman. They 'follow,' as Coleridge says of Shakespeare, 'the main march of the human affections.' The vulgar and obtrusive elements of personality are cast off, and in proportion as the characters are divested of what is purely individual, do they gain in interest and elevation. Penelope, Nausicaa, Andromache, Antigone, Iphigenia, are beings far less complex than the heroines of a dozen novels that come out now in a single year. Their beauty and truth lie precisely in their typical humanity. Nor, in gaining universal significance, do the women of Greek literature fade into abstract types. The finer shades of character are not excluded by the simplicity with which the main lines are drawn. In discarding what is accidental their individuality is not obliterated but deepened and enriched; for it is not disordered emotion or perplexity of motive that makes a character poetical, but power of will or power of love. Attentive study of such a poetic creation as Antigone reveals innumerable subtle traits illustrative of the general principle of Greek art by which the utmost variety of detail is admitted, if only it contributes to the total impression and is subject to a controlling unity of design.

For many centuries the standing quarrel of Greek literature had been between the poets and the philosophers. Poetry, said the philosophers, is all fiction, and immoral fiction too; philosophy seeks the good and the true. Plato, inheriting the ancient dislike of the wise men towards poetry, banished the poets from his ideal republic. Aristotle would heal the strife. He discovers a meeting-point of poetry and philosophy in the relation in which they stand to the universal. We should have been glad if he had explained his conception of the exact difference between them; clearly, he did not intend to merge poetry in philosophy. Following the lines of his general theory we can assert thus much,—that poetry is akin to philosophy in so far as it aims at expressing the universal; but that, unlike philosophy, it employs the medium of sensuous and imaginative form. In this sense poetry is a concrete philosophy, ‘a criticism of life’ and of the universe. This is completely true only of the higher imaginative creations, of such poems as those of Homer, Aeschylus, Shakespeare, Dante. In them there is an interpretation of man and of life and of the world; a connected scheme and view of things not systematised or consciously unfolded, but latent, underlying the poet’s thought and essential to the unity of the poem. Poets, too, even of an inferior order, who, like Wordsworth, are capable of presenting truly, if not the whole of life, yet certain definite aspects of it in imaginative form, are in their own way philosophers. They embody a consistent and harmonious wisdom of their own.

Between poetry and philosophy there had been an ancient feud. It was otherwise with poetry and history. Here at first there was no opposition.

'Poetry,' says Bacon, 'is feigned history'; much of the poetry of the Greeks might be called authentic history,—true not in precision of detail or in the record of personal adventures, but in its indication of the larger outlines of events and its embodiment in ideal form of the past deeds of the race. Aristotle himself speaks of the myths as history; the incidents they narrate are facts (τὰ γινόμενα); the names of their heroes are 'historical' (γινόμενα ὀνόματα) as opposed to fictitious (παιποιημένα) names.<sup>1</sup> In this sense Greek tragedy was historical, but its facts were drawn not from recent history or contemporaneous events. The tragedian was the successor of the epic poet, who was himself the earliest historian of the Greek race and the keeper of its archives. Homer, it is true, is not to us as he was to the Greeks the minute and literal chronicler of the Trojan war. We may smile when we think of his lines being quoted and accepted as evidence in the settlement of an international claim. Yet the Homeric poems are still historical documents of the highest value; and that not merely as reflecting the life of the poet's age, the sentiments and manners of the heroic society of which he formed a part, but also as preserving the popular traditions of Greece. Not many years ago it was the fashion to speak of the legendary history of Greece as legend and nothing more. Art and archaeology are every day adding fresh testimony as to its substantial truth. Explorations and excavations are restoring the traditional points of contact between Greece and Asia Minor. Famous dynasties which not long since had been resolved into sun-myths again stand out as historical realities. Troy, Tiryns, Mycenae rest on sure foundations; their past greatness, their lines of princes, their relations with outside states, are not the dreams of poetic imagination. The kernel of truth, which was thought to be non-existent or undiscoverable, is being extracted by the new appliances of the historical method.

The Hellenic people, in short, are found to have perpetuated their history with marvellous fidelity through popular myth. Myth was the unwritten literature of an early people, whose instinctive language was poetry. It was at once their philosophy and their history. It enshrined their unconscious theories of life, their reflexions upon things human and divine. It recorded all that they knew about their own past, about their cities and families, the geographical movements of their tribes and the exploits of their ancestors. Myth to the Greeks was not simply what we mean by legend. Aristotle observes that the poet is none the less a poet or maker though the incidents of his poem should chance to be actual events; for some actual events have that internal stamp of the probable or possible which makes them the subject matter of poetry.<sup>1</sup> Such were the 'actual events' recorded in myth. They lay ready to the poet's hand as an anonymous work, touched by the imagination of an artistic race, many of them hardly needing to be recast from the poetic mould in which they lay. Truth and fiction were here fused together, and the collective whole was heroic history. This was the idealising medium through which the past became poetical; it afforded that imaginative remoteness which enabled the hearers to escape from present realities. It lifted them into a higher sphere of existence where the distractions of the present were forgotten in the thrilling stories of an age which, though distant, appealed to them by many associations. The Athenians fined Phrynichus for his Capture of Miletus not because the event it represented was historical instead of mythical, but because it was recent and painful history. As the fairy-land of fancy was to Spenser so the Greeks looked to poetry as a refuge from the miseries and toilsomeness of life. The comic poet Timocles in explaining the effect of tragedy gives expression to the common sentiment of Greece. 'The mind, made to forget its own sufferings' and

Greek poetry and art with true historic sense did not take the present as an isolated point, but projected it into the past, whose half-effaced outlines were restored by the imagination. Myth was the golden link which bound together the generations. The odes of Pindar are a case in point. The poet, starting from the individual victor in the games, raises the interest above the personal level and beyond the special occasion, by giving historical perspective and background to the event. The victor's fortunes are connected with the annals of his house, with the trials and triumphs of the past. Nor does the poet stop at the deeds of ancestors. The mention of a common ancestor—of a Heracles—will transport him from Lacedaemon to Thessaly. He passes outside the family and the city and sweeps with rapid glance from colony to mother-city, from city to country, from the personal to the Panhellenic interest. Thus the ode is more than an occasional poem, and the theme as it is unfolded acquires a larger meaning. 'The victor is transfigured into a glorious personification of his race, and the present is reflected, magnified, illuminated in the mirror of the mythic past.'<sup>1</sup> The ode rises by clear ascents from the individual to the universal.

It is this that constitutes Greek idealism. The world of reality and the world of imagination were not for the Greeks separate spheres which stood apart; the breath of poetry kindled the facts of experience and the traditions of the past. The ideal in Greek art was not the opposite of the real, but rather its fulfilment and perfection. Each sprang out of the same soil; the one was the full-blown flower of which the other was the germ.

WORKS BY PROFESSOR BUTCHER.

SOME ASPECTS OF THE GREEK GENIUS. By S. H. BUTCHER, Litt.D., LL.D., Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh, formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and of University College, Oxford. Second Edition, revised. Crown 8vo. 7s. net.

ARISTOTLE'S THEORY OF POETRY AND FINE ART.

With a Critical Text and a Translation of the Poetics. By S. H. BUTCHER, Litt.D., LL.D. Third Edition. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"He has done for his subject all that a very acute intelligence and a rarely brilliant style could effect in the way of elucidation. The translation is perfect. . . . The treatise is full of profoundly interesting and instructive criticisms and comments on both ancient and modern literature. . . . A critical edition of the Poetics well worthy of the great Universities with which he has been and is so intimately connected."

DEMOSTHENES. By S. H. BUTCHER, Litt.D., LL.D. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. [Classical Writers].

ACADEMY.—"As fresh and attractive in form as it is ripe in learning and thorough in method."

THE ODYSSEY OF HOMER. Done into English prose by S. H. BUTCHER, Litt.D., LL.D., Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh; and A. LANG, LL.D., late Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
